It is at the outset remarkable that the bard or dum, in spite of his influence and sympathy with the people, is not Afghan by blood. This follows from the fact that the pure-bred Afghan condescends to two forms of employment and two only—war and agriculture. All other trades and professions are left to the inferior castes, and from these the bards are recruited. It is needless to add that the literary poet, who has received a higher education, and is immersed in prettinesses "from the Persian," looks with a becoming contempt upon the low-caste effusions of the dum.

Of the songs collected and edited by M. Darmesteter, the most important and interesting are naturally the historical, which extend over a period of nearly fifty years, from 1828 to 1881. In fact, the whole history of modern Afghanistan might be rewritten from the popular poetry. According to the chronicler, Hayât Muḥammad, the rising of 1839 against the English was to a great extent due to the excitement produced by the bards—a circumstance which appears to have escaped the notice of Kaye, the English historian of the event, à propos of whom M. Darmesteter remarks:

"L'historien anglais de cette guerre n'a pas un mot pour ces chansons dont probablement il ignore l'existence. Imaginez un historien racontant les guerres de la Révolution sans connaître la Marseillaise."

With regard to the love-songs, the general reader will probably be concerned to hear that their poetical value is slight, with the single exception of the ballad of the mad poet of Abbottabad (No. 77)—"une chose unique, 'moitié Baudelaire, moitié cantique des cantiques.'" But, on the whole, and in conclusion:

"cette poésie a une chose qui fait tout pardonner, la passion et surtout la simplicité, l'expression directe et spontanée, ce don suprême qui manque à notre décadence intellectuelle."

It has been impossible within narrow limits to give any but a faint idea of the character of this masterpiece or of the qualities displayed in its execution. Suffice it to say that a task of three-fold difficulty and complexity has been worthily accomplished by one who combines in a conspicuous degree the endowments of the philologist, the historian, and the poet.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE GODDESS KADESH AND THE SEMITISM OF THE HITTITES.

London: August 26, 1890.

Dr. Puchstein, of Berlin, in his recently-issued Pseudohethitische Kunst (with the general conclusions expressed in which I can by no means agree), makes a suggestion with regard to the goddess Kadesh—or "Qedesch," as he gives it—and the Hittite city of Kadesh which merits attention. This goddess is represented, on Egyptian monuments, standing on a lion, after the fashion to be seen on the sculptures of Boghaz-keui and elsewhere. Dr. Puchstein thinks that, if the goddess is to be associated with the city of like name, there is then evidence that the ancient Hittites conceived of their deities in the same manner as did the Assyrians—and, it may be added, the Babylonians, who, in this particular, are not to be sharply distinguished. And, according to the treatise ascribed to Lucian, the Syrian goddess, at the temple of Hierapolis, was borne by lions—a statement corroborated in the main by Roman coins of Hierapolis.

There are, I believe, in existence at least three bas-reliefs representing the goddess Kadesh, accompanied on her right by an Egyptian ithyphallic deity, and on her left by the Phoenician or Syrian god Resheph. One of these bas-reliefs is in the British Museum, and others are in the Louvre and at Turin. In the British Museum example the name of the goddess is inaccurately given, "having been, by an error of the artist, substituted for the final sibilant, so that we should have to read the name Katon (little)—a Semitic name truly, but one entirely unsuitable to a goddess represented as much taller than the accompanying figures. That an Egyptian sculptor should fall into error with regard to the name of a foreign deity is not at all wonderful, especially when, as in this case, the letters are similar; and Mr. Le Page Renouf tells me that errors of one kind or other are far from uncommon in the Egyptian texts. At Paris, and I believe also at Turin, there is no doubt respecting the final letter, so that the name of the goddess is Kadesh or Kodesh,* that is, "Holy," or "Holiness." The three deities on the monument at Paris are figured by M. Pierret in his Panthéon Egyptien. The goddess has upon her head a crescent moon, within which is an orb. A consideration of the whole of the facts can scarcely leave the matter in any doubt that the goddess is no other than the great Asiatic goddess Ishtar or Ashtoreth, associated alike with the planet Venus and with the moon. She may have acquired the name Kadesh by transference from cities where she was pre-eminently worshipped, especially the noted city on the Orontes. The last named would be in this case the most probable on account of its prominence, and the great battle which was fought there between the Egyptians and the Hittites.† On the other hand, the name Kadesh, "Holy," may be regarded as assigned to the goddess merely on account of her peculiar sacredness. If this view is taken, the remarkable fact emerges that an adjective with masculine form is used with reference to a feminine deity. But, regarding this deity as Ishtar, Ashtor, Ashtoreth, an explanation is not very far to seek. Not only have we the androgynous Ashtor-Chemosh of the Moabite

† The name of the city Kadesh had not been found till lately in any cuneiform inscription. Mr. Pinches has now, however, deciphered a tablet in the British Museum on which the name occurs. The tablet relates to the transfer of three cows and their young one by Milki-idiri governor of Kadesh (Kidish or Kedesch). The transaction took place in the fortieth year of Nebuchadnezzar. But as the place where it occurred was Tyre, there is at least a possibility that the Kadesh referred to may have been a town or city nearer to Tyre than was the Kadesh on the Orontes. It should be noticed that the name of the governor is Semitic. Mr. Pinches's translation is, I believe, to be published in a forthcoming volume of the new series of Records of the Past.

Stone, but also among certain Semites there was a male Ashtor.* According to a cuneiform inscription (W. A. I., vol. iii. p. 53), as translated by Prof. Sayce, the androgynous character of Ishtar was associated with the planet Venus as a morning star and as an evening star, Venus being in the former case masculine, and in the latter feminine.†

But what I particularly wish to bring out is that a goddess depicted after the Hittite manner bears a name identical with that of a very prominent Hittite city, this name being in form Semitic or even Hebrew.‡ The indication thus furnished should be taken together with other indications of Semitism furnished by the Hittite monuments, though it would be exceedingly rash to affirm that the Hittite hieroglyphs were used only by persons speaking Semitic dialects.

I may here append a remark with regard to the occurrence of the equilateral triangle on Hittite monuments, a matter to which I made some reference in a communication to the ACADEMY, Aug. 13, 1887, and which I discussed more fully in Nature, April 26, 1888. I had a good while before detected that the symbol of divinity or sacredness on the Hittite monuments in the British Museum is the straight stroke and crescent (see Nature, April 19, 1888). I ought to have noticed that the equilateral triangle standing on three pillars or supports occurs on one of the Museum monuments with the sign of divinity or sacredness doubled above it, thus confirming the opinions which I had expressed. The monument is that having a figure standing in relief above the inscription, which is one of the three more considerable inscriptions obtained by the Museum from Jerablûs. The symbols alluded to occur in the last line but one to the spectator's left.

THE ARYANS.

Settrington Rectory, York: August 30, 1890.

There are two difficulties in Prof. Sayce's argument which I should be grateful if he would solve.

First, he assumes that all the brachycephalic people of Western Europe belonged to one race. No one will question his assertion that the brachycephalic Auvergnats are dark, but he goes on to say that "there is no evidence at all" that any of the brachycephalic people of the Bronze Age were blond. Instead of there being no evidence, it seems to me that the evidence is overwhelming. The tall brachycephalic people of the Bronze Age, whose remains are found in the British round barrows, must be identified with the Celts of the south and east of England. Now Strabo says that the hair of the Coritavi (Lincolnshire) was yellow; Lucan says the Britons were flavi; Silius Italicus says they had golden hair; Dio Cassius describes the long xanthous locks of Boadicea.

Not only was one brachycephalic race tall and fair, and the other short and dark, but the skull of the Auvergnat differs in essential points from that found in the round barrows. The low parietal angle of the Auvergnat skull is by itself sufficiently distinctive.

Prof. Sayce then proceeds to identify the Auvergnats with the Galtchas of Central Asia.

* Driver's Samuel, p. xci., after Baethgen.

† Trans. Soc. Bib. Arch., vol. iii., Sayce on "Astronomy and Astrology of the Babylonians," pp. 196, 197. Prof. Sayce adds, in a note, "The Assyrian word here is very remarkable, zi-ca-rat, as if one could coin a term like 'male-ess.'"

‡ As Mr. Renouf observes, the Egyptian monuments alluded to may be reasonably regarded as executed at the time when especially the Egyptians had relations with the Syrian peoples, some 1200 or 1300 years before Christ.

The bronze culture, he says, came from Asia. Therefore he sees "no way of avoiding the conclusion" that the brachycephalic people of the Bronze Age were also of Asiatic origin. To me the way seems easy. Archaeology proves decisively—(1) that that Auvergnat race arrived in Western Europe early in the neolithic age; (2) that the brachycephalic Auvergnats are not of the same race as the brachycephalic people who in this country we associate with the use of bronze; (3) that the bronze culture was not introduced by immigrants, but that it spread over Europe from the Mediterranean northwards, from tribe to tribe, by the peaceful processes of commerce at a time subsequent to the arrival of both the brachycephalic races.

Lastly, Prof. Sayce says that the typical Gaul resembled the typical German so as to be indistinguishable. It is true that ancient writers describe both as tall, fierce, and with red or yellow hair. But the resemblance was superficial only. The Roman writers were not anthropologists, and we now know that the skulls of the two races were very different. The typical German skull is seen in the row graves. It is highly dolichocephalic, with a mean index of 71.3, and it is platycephalic in the extreme. The typical Celtic skull is found in the round barrows. It is brachycephalic, with a mean index of 81, and with a well-formed coronal arch.

In face of these facts, it seems as difficult to identify Gauls and Germans as to identify the short Auvergnats with the tall brachycephalic people of the round barrows; and if either of these identifications fails, then Penka's theory, which Prof. Sayce adopts, breaks down entirely.

SCIENCE NOTES.

PROF. FLOWER and Mr. Lydekker are engaged in preparing for publication An Introduction to the Study of Mammals, Recent and Extinct. It is based mainly upon the articles contributed by the first named author and Mr. G. E. Dobson to the ninth edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica; but much new matter will be added, and the whole brought up to date. The publishers are Messrs. Black, of Edinburgh, and the work is expected to appear before the end of the year.

A WORK ON The Birds of the Japanese Empire, by Mr. Henry Seebohm, illustrated with numerous woodcuts, is nearly ready for publication by Mr. R. H. Porter. The same publisher has in the press The Birds of Sussex, by Mr. William Borrer, with a map of the country and six coloured plates by J. G. Keulemans.

THE library of the late Dr. Francis Day—consisting of about 1200 volumes, bearing more particularly on fishes and fish culture—was presented on his death by his daughters to the Cheltenham public library; and it has been included in the catalogue just issued by the chief librarian, Mr. William Jones.

THE Australian Association for the Advancement of Science will hold its third annual meeting at Christchurch, New Zealand, in January, 1891, when Baron F. von Müller will resign the chair, and Sir James Hector, president-elect, will deliver an address. Information may be obtained from Mr. A. Vaughan Jennings, 27, Chancery-lane, the local secretary in London.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

THE English Dialect Society has now ready for issue to its members (through Messrs. Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner & Co.) its two volumes for the current year, which form Nos. 60 and 61 of its set of publications. These are: English Dialects: Their Sounds and Homes, by Dr. Alexander J. Ellis, with two maps of the dialect districts, being an abridgment of the author's "Existing Phonology of English Dialects," which forms Part v. of his "Early English Pronunciation," with a selection of the examples reduced to the glossic notation; and A Glossary of Dialect and Archaic Words used in the County of Gloucester, compiled and collected by J. Drummond Robertson, and edited by Lord Moreton. Among the other works in hand are: Norfolk and Suffolk Words, by Mr. Walter Rye; The Strong Verbs in the Modern Dialects of the South of England, by Dr. Karl B. Bülbring; and a Dictionary of English Bird-Names, by Miss Ellen Shadwell. The treasurer of the society—to whom subscriptions should be paid—is Mr. George Milner, The Manor House, Altrincham, Cheshire.

DR. CHRIST'S Griechische Literaturgeschichte (noticed in the ACADEMY of August 9) will be followed by a Byzantinische Literaturgeschichte, by Dr. K. Krumbacher; and Dr. Schanz's Geschichte der römischen Literatur im Altertum, by a Geschichte der römischen Literatur im Mittelalter, by Dr. Traube.

FINE ART.

MR. HOLMAN HUNT'S NEW PICTURE.

THE picture on which Mr. Holman Hunt has been engaged for the last two years, "May Morning on Magdalen Tower," is now at last finished, and will be exhibited at the beginning of the winter season at some gallery in the West End. Mr. Hunt has taught us to expect something new—a fresh conquest—in every picture; and the latest of the wonderful series has certainly that novelty which he prizes so greatly, and which comes to us with so refreshing a difference from the work of the ordinary artist. The subject—that beautiful Magdalen ceremony of singing a hymn on the tower at sunrise on May-day—is not perhaps of the obviously picturesque kind; beautiful it is when one thinks of it, and impressive when one hears of it, but somewhat less charming in the actual crowd and crush that one really sees. Mr. Hunt has shut out the unruly spectators, admitting one only, for a purpose, and with a distinct gain to the effect. And he has arranged his group of singers, and—with a "poetic licence" for which there is a certain historical justification—decorated them, putting flowers in the boys' hands, wreathing them around the surplices, strewing the foreground with them. The pictorial beauty of the subject is undoubtedly increased by these indications of the floral nature of the festival.

The scene is the south-eastern corner of the tower, looking down on the Ilfley Road, of which one just catches a glimpse or two—red roofs and the green of trees—through the battlements between the pinnacles. The early morning sky—the time is five o'clock—breaks up into patches of fleeting blue and green and pink, with fleecy clouds, flushing into rose, across it; birds fly in wavering lines against it, some in the distance, others quite near, passing across the sunrise. The lead of the roof slopes down to the left; all the figures are on a slightly inclined plane. To the right are the Fellows, six in number, with a single spectator. Then come other figures—choristers, young men and boys in white—grouped with a cunning carelessness; and, between these and other tiers of singers, apertures through which one sees the roofs and gardens, similar arches again revealing the landscape below in advance of the figures. The foreground is strewn with flowers in heaps and bunches, some of them placed in a large silver bowl, an interesting piece of plate, given to Magdalen during the reign of Charles II. The faces are mostly portraits, several of historic interest. The one on the extreme right is Dr. Parratt, the organist at Windsor. Dr. Burdon Sanderson, the professor of physiology, rests his hand against a portion of the battlements; he wears his M.A. gown, with the scarlet hood slipping round in front, the result of a happy accident. Next to him is Sir John Stainer, in a surplice; then Mr. Bramley, who holds his cap in his hand, showing the lining. Then comes Dr. Bloxam, to whom the continuance of the ceremony is due; he wears his red and black D.D.'s gown. Mr. Warren, the President, stands next; then, nearest to us, comes the visitor, a Parsi, Mr. Cama, who represents the actual fire-worshipper, and clasps his hands, bowing his head reverently in adoration of the sun. He wears a white robe, matching the white of the surplices, and a scarlet turban, with white and yellow designs. The other men, in front and to the left of the picture, are Mr. Garland, who sings in the college chapel; the choirmaster, Dr. Roberts; and, by his side, Mr. Sherwood, the master of Magdalen School. Out of the eighteen choristers, seven are really in the choir; of the others, some are painted from choir boys at Fulham. The little boy who stands nearest to us in the row in front of the Fellows is Mr. Hunt's youngest son; in the same row is a son of Sir John Stainer; there are two sons of the late Lord Napier. The portrait-painting is wonderfully fine, in Mr. Hunt's minute, vivid, conscientious manner; and equally wonderful is the variety of effect, alike in faces and figures. The arrangement of the drapery—the white folds, so varied, natural, and beautiful—is specially worthy of note; and the boys group themselves with a boyish wilfulness, some of them turning jauntily or gaily regardless of the choirmaster, holding their music regardless of the notes.

The picture is alive; it has a new kind of beauty, brings a new element into Mr. Hunt's work; and if it has not the witchery and the conquering force of "Claudio and Isabella," of "The Scapegoat," of "The Two Gentlemen of Verona," of "The Light of the World," it has its own charm and power, and comes worthily into the line of those past and unsurpassable successes.

ARTHUR SYMONS.

OBITUARY.

DUBOIS-PILLET.

News has just reached me of the death of Dubois-Pillet, one of the group of "néo-impressionistes," which also comprised Signac, Georges Seurat, Camille and Lucien Pissarro.

Louis-Auguste-Albert Dubois-Pillet was an officer of the Republican Guard—as such, thoroughly military, upright, courteous, and severe. In his other aspect he appears as one of the most courageous of the reactionary painters of the last decade.

His artistic life dates actually from his admission to the Salon in 1877. It is a mere date, the fact is otherwise of no account. Refused at the Champs Elysées each succeeding year, he comes first into notice in the incongruous Tuilleries Exhibition (May, 1884). Among the many who remarked his "Enfant Mort" was Emile Zola, who in L'Œuvre describes it, attributing it, under the same title, to his hero Claude Lantier.

The Tuilleries Exhibition, a reflection of the historical Salon des Refusés of 1863, with a parallel in our "Rejected" Exhibition of a year or two ago, was an experiment not to be repeated. Before it broke up, Dubois-Pillet contrived a conference of some of the exhibitors with a view to the formation of a permanent society.

In less than a week, by his energy, rules were drawn up, approved, and published; and the Société des Artistes Indépendants was organised—in the face of every kind of difficulty, not least the timidity or indifference of its members. In December of the same year, the Indépendants opened their doors for the first time.

Dubois has been a prolific contributor to their exhibitions, sending a great variety of subjects—landscapes saturated by the intense blueness of the sky, the trees and other forms defined with purple, resulting from the fusion of the blue of the air with the ruddiness of the ground, the purple in its turn forcing contiguous objects into orange, yellow; landscapes with floating, immaterialised distances, and vibrating withal with a diffuse and ambrous light; portraits and figure-subjects strong and virulent in colour; still-lives of strange harmony; brilliant flowers; fruits even. There is quite a personal sweetness about his compositions; his somewhat blonde vision gives to the oil a velvety texture, a dusty appearance of pastel.

Out of France, his pictures have been seen two or three times at the Expositions des Vingt.

To the Impressionistes—the wider school that includes under one name such varied artists as Edouard Manet, Degas, Claude Monet, Raffaëlli—it seemed that the presence of air and light in no matter what composition directly seen was cruelly misinterpreted, when not altogether ignored, by traditional painting; they thought that the conventional method, with universal receipts to give the impression of tone, based on the assumption that every object is isolated, and all are lighted with absolutely the same light, was powerless to note the varied and complex reflections upon which the life and vibration of an actual landscape depend. One means of escape from the limitations of tradition lay in the device of modelling by means of colour juxtaposition, discarding tone mediums altogether; in this way they contrived to envelop their subjects in air and light. Later came the artificial decomposition of colour (Claude Monet), but at this stage it was quite arbitrary.

The "néo-impressionistes," in 1884 and 1885, first ventured to rigorously apply the theory of colour, of which Mr. Rood's work is the prime source, and of which MM. Charles Henry and Félix Fénéon have written, in its application to painting. They proceeded to decompose colour in a scientific manner, with a view to a definite recomposition upon the retina of the spectator, thereby substituting "mélange optique" for "mélange matériel." A canvas painted in application of this theory presents, on close examination, a monotonous, multicoloured speckling. At a sufficient distance the eye, as is scientifically inevitable, recomposes surfaces of colour with a luminosity that the same components cannot produce if mixed upon the palette.

M. Dubois-Pillet was born in Paris on October 28, 1846, and died at Puy-en-Velay on August 18.

JOHN GRAY.

CORRESPONDENCE.

FAENZA AND CAFAGGIOLIO.

Homburg: Aug. 26, 1890.

Since the publication of my notice on Prof. Argnani's book, in the ACADEMY of August 9, I have been made aware of a review of that work by Dr. Umberto Rossi, published in the fourteenth number of the Nuova Serie of the Arte e Storia, which appeared at Florence on May 31 of this year, its author having courteously sent me a copy.

It is satisfactory to find that my opinion is in the main and in many particulars corroborated by Dr. Rossi, who is, however, naturally less inclined to be severe in his criticism of a compatriot's work. He fully agrees with me in condemning the hasty conclusion of Dr. Malagola as to the Casa Fagioli being the real source whence all those pieces of maiolica signed with the name Cafaggiolo, variously spelled, and with the monogram of P and Z combined, were derived, and as to the non-existence of the Tuscan bodega. He confirms my opinion as to Argnani's error in ascribing to Faenza alone, the production, in the early fourteenth century, of those wares having a white engobe beneath the plumbiferous glaze and the lavori-a-stecco, the sgraffiati mode of decoration. He also shows that the stanniferous glaze was in use in Tuscany probably as early as the trecento.

Dr. Rossi considers that the Casa Fagioli of Faenza has but small claim for consideration, agreeing with me that the whole theory built upon documents recording that one Guido Faxolus and his companions worked in 1530 "ad exercitum figuli de terra super rotam"—mere rough terraglia formed on the wheel, some of which might, possibly, have been made for subsequent decoration by artistic hands—is valueless, and in no way proves that this humble Guido was the maestro of a Casa Fagioli of equivalent importance with the Casa Pirota.

More important still is the announcement that the erudite Prof. Milanesi is now occupied in finishing a storia completa of the ceramic productions of Tuscany, based upon documentary evidence discovered by him, confirmed by fragments and whole pieces brought to light by excavation. He will shortly publish the documents on Fattorini and his predecessors at Cafaggiolo. These will prove that fabriques existed in various localities of Tuscany at which, in the fourteenth century, lead-glazed wares having a rude but characteristic decoration were made; and that, towards the end of the trecento, wares with a stanniferous glaze were produced. Decorative vases were also made by the Della Robbia. Towards the end of the fifteenth century Faentine artificers came to Tuscany, and about that time the Cafaggiolo bodega was established. The fabriques at Florence were not of long duration, leaving scarcely a trace after the middle of the sixteenth century. Cafaggiolo, however, continued under the direction of Antonio Fattorini (whose initials occur on the Galiano and other plates referred to in my last notice), but the productions were then inferior; poor imitations of the Urbino grotesques became the fashion—as we find in 1600 at Rome. A fabrique existed at Galiano and one at Monté, on the road to, and both probably dependent on, Cafaggiolo, the latest signed and dated piece of which is that of 1570 (Delange). The production of porcelain and of white maiolica then occupied Francesco de' Medici, who brought artists from Faenza for the work. After his death Nicolo Sisti obtained from the Grand Duke Ferdinand the right of producing porcelain and maiolica in Florence and at Pisa.

INSCRIPTIONS OF THE EMPEROR PIAVONIUS.

Daun: Aug. 27, 1890.

To the notes on PIAVONIUS already printed in the ACADEMY, I may perhaps add an inscription on a mosaic found at Trier and now in the museum there. It is made of black tesserae on a white ground:

M · PIAVONI · VICTO
RINVS TRIBVNVS · P
RET NORVM

On the question of "PIAVONIUS" against "Pius Avonius" I can offer no opinion. The latter expansion has lately been denied by M. Mowat, but, so far as I can see, without adding to our knowledge of the name. However, I know no instance of a point being inserted after the I of PIAVONIUS.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE Fine Art Society will have on view next month a second series of drawings of birds by Mr. Stacy Marks.

MESSRS. SEELEY & Co. have now ready an index to the twenty volumes of the Portfolio, which form the first series, ending with December of last year.

MR. R. R. ROSS has presented to the Manchester corporation fifty-eight water-colour drawings by deceased British artists, under one simple condition—that they shall be exhibited together and without charge in the Royal Institution. Many of these drawings are of great value, examples being included of David Cox, De Wint, Copley Fielding, Cotman, Prout, and George Cattermole.

THE following is a summary of the results hitherto obtained in the comprehensive excavation of the site of Silchester, which is now being conducted by the Society of Antiquaries. Until the present work nothing was known of the great western gate of the city except its site; but the present excavations have disclosed most interesting remains of this gate, under which passed the traffic along the main road through the Roman city. The roadway at the west gate was spanned by two arches. Among the massive fragments of the masonry uncovered is the impost of the gate, from which two arches sprang; and the mouldings on one side may be noted, cut away in order to allow the doors to shut against it. There are found to be two guard-rooms on each side of the gate, those on the south being most perfect. The wall here has a thickness of twelve feet, which decreases as it rises from the ground level; and it is backed by a great mound of earth. One point for investigation is whether or not this mound is of earlier Celtic origin. A paving of flints forms apparently a pathway to the top of the mound. At the west gate a fragment of a fine Corinthian capital has been found. As it has no connexion with the structure, it was apparently brought there for some purpose during the occupation of the city. The remains of the west gate are admirable specimens of masonry, large blocks of oolite and other stone having been employed. Among the objects found on the site is a large strip of iron pierced with nail holes, which evidently bound the bottom of a door of the gate and furnishes an idea of its massive thickness. A portion of an iron pivot has also been unearthed. The insula which is being dealt with is in proximity to the museum. A house has been excavated at the north-west corner, the museum, in fact, standing on a corner of it. Traces have been found of another large house at the north-east corner. Between the two houses there is a considerable area of open ground. The explorers are led to conjecture that in each square there may have been a certain number of houses with much open ground, consisting of courtyards and gardens. From its size and from the remains, it is considered that the house excavated was that of one of the wealthier inhabitants of the city. During the excavations, and principally at the insula, a large number of objects of antiquity have been unearthed. These have all been carefully labelled and classified, and occupy shelves in the temporary office.

MR. J. PERRIN has received the commission for a statue of Condorcet, to be erected on the left of the Institut, at Paris.

M. RAVAISSON has now concluded the reading of his revolutionary memoir before the Académie des Inscriptions—to which we have before called attention in the ACADEMY—upon the Venus of Milo. As the final result of his study of the statue, of the fragments associated with it, and of the configuration of the base, he concludes that it once formed part of a group with another personage, who placed his left hand upon the shoulder of the Venus, and towards whom she raised her right hand. This second personage, from a comparison of many ancient monuments, resembled the statue in the Louvre which has been for long taken to be an Achilles, but is really Mars. The original composition, from which the Milo statue was copied, represented Venus soothing and perhaps disarming the god of war. Its first authors were Alcámenes and Phidias. It was called the Venus of the Gardens, because it was placed in the district of Athens so-styled, which included the Ceramicus and the Academy, where the illustrious dead were buried, and where youth was glorified as in their presence. The Borghese Mars bears on his right leg the fetter proper to captives; and this emblem teaches us to recognise here, deified as Mars, Theseus, the hero of Athens, who had undergone voluntary servitude in order to free his fellow-citizens. The group, continued M. Ravaisson, conforms in its composition to the notions of apotheosis which almost all funerary monuments of antiquity suggest, and also to the ancient idea of heroism which represents, by the union of Venus (identified, as often, with Proserpine) with Theseus (transformed into Mars), the final deification crowning the heroic life. Accordingly, imitations were made, as time went on, to ornament tombs.

MUSIC.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

WE have received from Edwin Ashdown:

May Song, Gondolier for pianoforte, by H. Lichner. The first has a flowing theme, but the accompaniment is heavy; the second is a short and simple song without words. Andante and Scherzo for pianoforte, by Albert Fox. The andante pastorale is smooth and graceful; the quick movement which follows is somewhat vague. Quatre Morceaux de Salon, par François Beer, are short and easy pianoforte duets; the "Gavotte de grand mère" is not very quaint, and the loud bang at the close is modern and vulgar. The "Cradle Song" (No. 4) is most to our liking. Twenty-four Studies, for the pianoforte, by A. Loeschorn. Two Books, Op. 190. These studies are, as the composer himself styles them, "easy and melodious;" they are written in all the major and minor keys. The opus number shows that M. Loeschorn has had some experience; he is, in fact, a well-known teacher in Germany. The studies are good and useful.

From the London Music Publishing Company:

The Organist's Quarterly Journal, Parts 86 and 87. Part 86 contains a march in D, by E. Silas. The opening theme is effective, and the points of imitation are cleverly managed. The smooth trio in the key of B flat is agreeably harmonised: later on its subject serves as bass to a passage of massive harmonies in the principal key. The piece concludes with a bright coda. Dr. W. J. Westbrook contributes a pleasing Andante, founded on the chimes of St. Mary's, Cambridge. W. Molineux's Fantasia on "a favourite hymn-tune" is not a strong composition. An "Allegretto," by Ferris Tozer, is melodious and shows the influence of both Mendelssohn and Schumann. The "Bridal March," by W. H. Sangster, in Part 87, has some good things in it, only it would well bear curtailment. Dr. J. H. Mee's "Chorale" is sound and solid. An "Adagio," by Dr. J. Makinson Fox, opens with a taking theme; but though the movement is short, the absence of modulation produces monotony.

Sonata in F major for piano and violin, by Erskine Allon (Op. 19.) An andante maestoso serving as introduction is founded on an excellent theme given out first by pianoforte. The allegro moderato is an effective movement: the theme just mentioned serves as second subject. The slow movement is broadly conceived, and worked out with much skill. The finale is full of life. Mr. Allon is a serious musician, and shows courage in writing work of this kind rather than the ephemeral pieces so much in vogue. In this Sonata the music, though on the whole interesting, betrays perhaps too much effort; and Mr. Allon would do well to write, at times, more comfortably for the pianist.

Annie of Lochroyan, traditional Scotch Ballad, for soprano solo, mixed chorus and orchestra, by Erskine Allon (Op. 20). It is difficult to judge of the effect of this Ballad from a vocal score, but we are inclined to think that it will prove decidedly effective. So far as we are acquainted with the composer's works, this seems one of his best. The music is fresh, the harmonies skilful, and the workmanship of a high order. The conception of the whole is essentially dramatic. The soprano solo is, of course, the unhappy maiden herself, while the chorus tell of her sorrows and sad fate. The theme of her first song, which has a Scottish flavour, runs through the work; the wicked mother is also represented by a motive. Thus we have two contrasting elements. The music is quite modern in character, and shows the spirit rather than the letter of Wagner; the influence of Dvorák is also perceptible.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

MUSIC NOTES.

THE thirty-fifth annual series of concerts will commence at the Crystal Palace on October 11. Among the new choral works to be produced are Dr. Hubert Parry's Cantata, "L'Allegro ed il Penseroso"; Grieg's scenes from "O lav Trygvason" (Op. 50) for solo, chorus, and orchestra; and Berlioz's ballad "La Mort d'Orphée" for female chorus and orchestra. Among the instrumental works to be performed for the first time are Dvorák's Symphony No. 4 in G, a Symphony in E minor by M. E. German, a Dramatic Overture by R. F. Ellicot, Ballet Airs from "Ascamo," and music to the Drama, "The Bride of Lammermoor" by Dr. Mackenzie. Messrs. Raderewski, Sapellnikoff, and Borwick will appear for the first time as pianists. Mr. Manns will, of course, be the conductor.

LITERATURE.

Ireland under the Tudors. Vol. III. By Richard Bagwell. (Longmans.)

THE publication of the concluding volume of Mr. Bagwell's Ireland under the Tudors furnishes a favourable opportunity for some remarks on the work as a whole.

According to Mr. Bagwell—and it may at once be admitted that he has on the whole fairly realised his ideal—the proper function of the historian is that of judge. He is not to approach his subject as an advocate, but accepting the facts as they are, to set them forth in such a manner and with just sufficient comment as to enable his readers, who stand in the position of jury, to draw therefrom their own conclusions. This, no doubt, is the true view to take of the historian's office, only unfortunately it is open to the objection that no history written on such principles can ever possess more than a very limited popularity. It is, therefore, not surprising to hear Mr. Bagwell's work generally described as dry and uninteresting. On the other hand, such a verdict is all the more calculated to commend the book to that small class of readers who are not only able and willing but also desirous to form their own opinions. And I must candidly confess that it was only after having independently travelled over much of the ground covered by these three volumes that I learnt really to appreciate Mr. Bagwell's work. The extraordinary patience which has enabled him to read so many thousands of State papers, the scrupulous fidelity with which he adheres to his authorities, the admirable criticism which he offers on points in dispute, and the impartiality of his judgments, can only be understood by those who have themselves devoted considerable study to the history of Ireland under the Tudors.

In a work of such general excellence as to entitle its author to a prominent place among our contemporary historians, it is pardonable to touch briefly upon what seems to be its principal defects. Some of these are doubtless inherent in the subject itself. For though the history of Ireland during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries is by no means an unattractive subject, yet the interest, if I may thus express myself, is so scattered, owing to the absence of any sense of national unity on the part of the Irish, that the historian who writes with an eye to chronology is constantly compelled to interrupt the course of his narrative in one quarter in order to resume it in another. The effect on the reader is to irritate and bewilder him. For this, I admit, the nature of the subject is mainly responsible; but it also seems, if I may venture to say so, partly due to a defective method in the treatment of Irish history. It was Grattan's opinion that the history of Ireland was best studied, not chronologically, but in relation to particular topics. Thus, the Irish Parliament, the English Church in Ireland, the Land Question, are subjects which not only permit of being treated separately, but which also gain infinitely thereby. So I hold that the history of Ireland under the Tudors, which in effect is the history of the conquest of the island by England, is best treated not chronologically but locally. It was not as if England had been contending with a united nation. A blow struck in the North had no effect in the South. The Spaniards landed in Kerry, and Munster was thrown into a state of ferment; but it did not seem an impossible thing, even to Lord Arthur Grey, to hold Ulster in check with a present of a butt or two of sack to old Tirlagh O'Neill. A common religion and a common suffering in time welded Irishmen into a nation, but religion had much less to do with Hugh O'Neill's rebellion than the traditions of his clan. Tradition was as the very breath of life to each Irishman. As his fathers had lived, so he was determined to live. Regardless of the danger that threatened him, he still perpetuated his old feuds; and as he stood alone, so did he fall singly an easy prey to the conqueror. Irish history during the sixteenth and first half of the seventeenth centuries is like the unravelled strands of a rope: each part must be taken up separately and in turn till we come to grasp the rope itself.

Another objection to Mr. Bagwell's history is that it has the appearance of being overburdened with detail. There is no seeing the wood for trees. Here again I am inclined to think the fault lies chiefly in the way in which the facts are presented. There is more the appearance than the reality of detail in Mr. Bagwell's work. At first one is perplexed by the rapidity with which the scene changes; but with study the feeling wears off, and one begins to estimate the facts at their proper value. Whether, indeed, Mr. Bagwell does not leave too much to the unaided intelligence of his readers is a questionable point. It is not always sufficient to put the jury in possession of the facts; the ripened experience of the judge is often necessary to present the facts in their true proportion. There are many whom the very appearance of Mr. Bagwell's work will appal, but its striking qualities will not fail to attract those who have the patience and ability requisite for its study.

The defects I have noted as generally characteristic of Mr. Bagwell's work are less noticeable in the last than in the two preceding volumes. Here the course of events adapts itself more naturally to a simple chronological form of narrative. The insurrection of James Fitzmaurice; the rebellion of the Earl of Desmond and his brother John; the settlement of Munster; the Spanish Armada; the rebellion of Tyrone; the Spanish invasion; and the government of Lord Deputy Mountjoy follow each other in natural sequence while, at the same time, standing out sufficiently prominently from one another as to allow of separate treatment. Turning to the rebellion of James Fitzmaurice, and particularly to his appeal for help to the English Catholics, it is to be regretted that Mr. Bagwell should have allowed himself to give expression to such controversial matter as is contained in the following paragraph:

"The whole document is a good example of the sanguine rhetoric in which exiles have always indulged, and of the way in which the leaders of Irish sedition have been accustomed to talk. The part assigned to continental powers and to English Catholics in the sixteenth century was transferred to the French monarchy in the seventeenth, and to the revolutionary republic in the eighteenth; and now in the nineteenth it is given to the United States of America, and to the British working-man."

This is not the only instance in which Mr. Bagwell offends against the canons of history and of good taste. On p. 238 we read that "English laws and English officers are unpopular in Ireland exactly in proportion to their efficiency." Both these statements may be true, though as regards the latter we have Sir John Davis's opinion to the contrary; but Mr. Bagwell would have done well to remember that, in the words of a distinguished contemporary historian, "he who studies the society of the past will be of greater service to the society of the present in proportion as he leaves it out of account."

Mr. Bagwell's account of the Desmond rebellion leaves little to be desired. The story of the capture of the Fort del Ore is told simply and without exaggeration. "The best defence of Grey, and yet not a very good one, is to be found in the cruelty of the age." This is doubtless the true view to take of Grey's conduct; but at the same time I am inclined to think that Mr. Bagwell disposes somewhat too lightly of the charge of bad faith preferred against him. For it must be remembered that the charge does not rest simply on the testimony of the Catholic historians O'Daly and O'Sullivan. The State Papers themselves (see particularly Henry Warren to the Lord Deputy, May 15, 1582) contain ample proof that the belief in Grey's bad faith towards the natives was very widespread; and it would perhaps be more correct to ascribe Capt. Mackworth's shameful death to the belief that he had been mainly instrumental in betraying a number of O'Connors than to any conjectural part he had taken in the massacre at Fort del Ore. That Irish officials in their dire extremity sometimes stooped to expedients which can only be characterised as vile is unhappily beyond dispute. Sir Warham St. Leger appears to have been gifted with a peculiarly easy conscience in this respect. Mr. Bagwell notices his nefarious project for accomplishing the destruction of the Earl of Desmond; but he omits to refer to what St. Leger implied in his suggestion, viz., that Silken Thomas had been deliberately and treacherously allured to his doom. In speaking of the trial of Chief Justice Nugent and his subsequent execution, Mr. Bagwell remarks that much blame was attached to Sir Robert Dillon, who succeeded Nugent as Chief Justice, for his conduct in the case. In an account of the trial and execution, which I recently came across among the Sloane MSS., it is said that Sir Robert Dillon, returning to his house at Riverstown on the afternoon of the execution, stopped his horse on the rising ground, and, turning towards Trim, said :

"Ha! friend Nugent, I think I am even with you for going between me and my place, and if I live I will do as much for him (meaning Christopher Fleming, the Queen's Attorney) that brought you letters out of England for that purpose."

The war with Desmond over, the way was prepared for the settlement and plantation of Munster; but the undertakers were slow to take possession, and slower still to fulfil the conditions of their grants. The work was still in progress when the news arrived of the approach of the long expected Armada. Mr. Bagwell's narrative, which is based on Captain Duro's Armada Invincible, will be read with interest, and particularly his account of the wanderings and hair-breadth escapes of Captain Francisco de Cuellar, who was cast ashore on the coast of Sligo, and, after suffering incredible hardships, managed to make his way to Antwerp. The Armada had missed its end; but Spanish emissaries were soon at work again fanning the flames of domestic rebellion with promises of help from abroad. It was an anxious time for the government, and the position of Lord Deputy Sir William Fitzwilliam was far from being an enviable one. Fitzwilliam, as Mr. Bagwell remarks, was not a great man, but he was eminently serviceable, and did much to advance the power of the Crown in Ireland. He was charged with cruelty and corruption in the exercise of his office, and with being a principal cause of the rebellion of the Earl of Tyrone; but one cannot read the elaborate vindication of himself which he addressed to Elizabeth shortly before his death (Add. MSS. No. 12,503, ff. 389-397) without being convinced that there was less of truth than of malice in the charge.

It is impossible within the limits allotted to me to discuss as fully as I could otherwise have desired Mr. Bagwell's account of the closing years of Elizabeth's reign. The chief event of those years was the rebellion of the Earl of Tyrone and the suppression of that rebellion by Lord Mountjoy. One of the worst effects of the war was the debasement of the coinage, a curious consequence of the evils of which may be read in Sir John Davis's report of Gilbert v. Brett in the Council Chamber :

"During the last four years and a half of the Queen's reign," says Mr. Bagwell, "it was computed that the Irish war had cost her about £1,200,000, and this was an enormous demand upon the slender revenue of those days. The drain upon the life-blood of England was also terrible. Drove of recruits were forced annually into the ranks to perish among the bogs and woods, while the most distinguished officers did not escape. The three Norrises, Clifford, Burgh, Bagenal, and Bingham died in Ireland, while Essex and Spenser were indirectly victims of the war there. The price was high, but it secured the conquest of Ireland. Lawyers in the next reign might ascribe the glory to James; but the hard work was all done ready to his hand, and it would not have been done at all had it been left to him. It was by Elizabeth that the power of the chiefs was broken, and until that was done neither peaceable circuits nor commercial colonies were possible in Ireland. The method pursued was cruel, but the desired end was attained. It is easy to find fault; but none who love the greatness of England will withhold their admiration from the lonely woman who repelled all attacks from her realm, who broke the power of Spain, and who, though surrounded by conspirators and assassins, believed she had a mission to accomplish, and in that faith held her proud neck unbent."

In conclusion, I would merely say that the statement, which appears to rest on the authority of Ben Jonson, to the effect that one of Spenser's children perished in the flames at Kilcolman, is untrustworthy.

R. DUNLOP.

THE PARCHMENT LIBRARY.—Selected Poems of Matthew Prior. With an Introduction and Notes by Austin Dobson. (Kegan Paul & Co.)

MR. DOBSON has done many things which deserve well of the republic of letters; and this pretty volume of selections from Prior, with its readable introduction and useful notes, adds to the load of obligation.

Prior is not, of course, the most interesting of the lesser poets. Johnson, indeed, sneers at his "amorous effusions" as the "dull exercises of a skilful versifier," and at his "greater pieces" as "tissues of common thoughts." On the other hand, Cowper and Thackeray speak in warm terms of his elegance, humour, melody, and good sense. This judgment Mr. Dobson, a better authority perhaps than either, endorses. But while we must grant that Prior deserves all praise for his good sense and good temper, his facility of expression and sureness of hand, his spontaneity and ease, his vivacity and fun, we must allow that he is wanting in some of the subtler qualities which are needed to make even vers de société of the finest sort—such, for instance, as his present editor can write. An occasional touch of tenderness, as in the exquisite verses "To a Child of Quality," and a hint of genuine earnestness, as in "The English Padlock," may now and then be found; but there is a chronic defect of sympathy and reverence. Notwithstanding this, Prior may be called the last of the Cavalier poets, the successor of Waller and Lovelace and Herrick, crying out in the Georgian wilderness of dreary didacticism. To Waller he comes nearest; to Herrick he shows considerable affinity both in his light-hearted lyrics and in his insolent epigrams; with the wholly chivalrous Lovelace he has less in common.

It is hardly necessary to say that Mr. Dobson's selection is admirably made. It omits the mechanical "Carmen Seculare," and most of the other laudatory verses on "Nassau's Virtue" and "Great William's Glory;" but it includes the brilliant "English Ballad on the Taking of Namur by the King of Great Britain, 1695," a burlesque parallel to Boileau's "Ode sur la Prise de Namur par les Armes du Roy, l'année 1692." It excludes most of the lively but impossible tales—an inevitable though deplorable omission. It is, I think, almost a pity that the editor did not break through his rule of giving whole pieces only, in order to print some of the earlier parts of "Hans Carvel," with its vivid picture of the day of the woman of fashion in the time of Queen Anne. Times have changed; and the modern editor has to show more severity than Dr. Johnson, who finds no fault on the score of indelicacy with the other tales, and of "Hans Carvel" itself only remarks that it is "not over-decent." In one or two cases, perhaps, Mr. Dobson's modesty gets a little the better of him. His neat alteration of the last of the stanzas addressed to the "Honble. Charles Montague, Esq.," was surely unnecessary; and the excision of the two lines in "An English Padlock" (carefully indicated by stops),

"Where the fat Bawd and lavish Heir
The Spoils of ruin'd Beauty share," seems quite uncalled for. A book like this is presumably not designed for the use of infant-schools. Besides, the editor's sense of propriety is too spasmodic to be serviceable; he retains in "Alma" several passages which are somewhat less delicate and decidedly more detailed.

"Alma" has been a puzzle to critics on account of its want of obvious motive. Like the senior wrangler who had been induced to read Paradise Lost, they ask: What does it all prove? It is a sort of burlesque philosophical dialogue in Hudibrastic octosyllabics, showing many signs of the natural affinity between the muse of Prior and that of the so-called metaphysical poets. But it is either too serious, or not serious enough, for genuine burlesque. Mr. Dobson quotes Voltaire, and says that he did not share Goldsmith's difficulty in understanding it. But the last words of his quotation (p. 235) hint that Voltaire was not quite clear whether to regard it as partly in earnest or not. This strange poem purports to be a discussion on the seat of the soul; and Matt (Prior) lays down a theory midway between the Aristotelian doctrine adopted at Oxford and the Cartesian doctrine adopted at Cambridge.

"My single system shall suppose,
That Alma enters at the toes;
That then she mounts by just degrees
Up to the ankles, legs, and knees;
Next as the sap of life does rise
She lends her vigour to the thighs;
And all these under-regions past,
She nestles somewhere near the waist;
Gives pain or pleasure, grief or laughter,
As we shall show at large hereafter.
Mature, if not improv'd by time,
Up to the heart she loves to climb;
From thence, compell'd by craft and age,
She makes the head her latest stage."

This curious thesis is developed, with many digressions, at great length in three cantos. The ambling verse is diversified with many quaint conceits, and with considerable parade of learning, which, however, unlike Butler's, is obviously superficial and second-hand. The second interlocutor, Dick, the author's friend Richard Shelton, sums up the discussion with the characteristic Epicureanism of the period:

"That people live and die, I knew
An hour ago as well as you.
And, if Fate spins us longer years,
Or is in haste to take the shears,

I know we must both fortunes try,
And bear our evils, wet or dry.
Yet, let the goddess smile or frown,
Bread we shall eat or white or brown :
And, in a cottage or a court,
Drink fine champagne or muddled port.
What need of books those truths to tell,
Which folks perceive who cannot spell ?
And must we spectacles apply
To view what hurts our naked eye ?

"Sir, if it be your worship's aim
To make me merrier than I am,
I'll be all night at your devotion.
Come on, friend ; broach the pleasing notion :
But, if you would depress my thought,
Your system is not worth a groat."

Mr. Dobson judiciously excludes the once-admired "Henry and Emma," in which Prior is at his worst. He tells us the idea was suggested to him by his Chloe (who could hardly have been so degraded and despicable as his biographers represent) ; but whether or no, it must be counted to him for righteousness that he appreciated the old ballad sufficiently to consider it worth spoiling. There praise must end ; for while a comparison of the original and the improved version is one of the best possible introductions to the study of eighteenth-century literature, it is an awful lesson to restorers and modernisers.

The editor reprints as Introduction his paper on Prior which appeared in the New Princeton Review, and furnishes some interesting notes embodying information contained in the (unpublished) account of Prior drawn up directly after his death by his friend Sir James Montague, brother of Halifax—a MS. formerly in possession of the Portland family, and now at Longleat. It is strange that so much doubt exists as to the birthplace, parentage, and boyhood of the poet ; nor can it be said that Mr. Dobson's interesting notes make matters much clearer. The evidence in favour of taking Wimborne as the birthplace is not altogether convincing ; and the only authoritative documents available, the records of St. John's College, Cambridge, of which society Prior became a fellow in 1688, contradict themselves. A fair, though not overwhelming, case is made for transferring the scene of the famous meeting between the boy Prior and the Earl of Dorset from the old Rummer Tavern at Charing Cross to the Rhenish Wine House in Channel (now called Cannon) Row, Westminster. Surely the fact that the latter was in 1660 kept by a Prior does not count for much, especially when we know that the landlord of the Rummer Tavern was in 1688 a Samuel Prior ; Mr. Dobson's strong point is the witness of Sir James Montague's "Memorandums." The notes on the Montagues, Fleetwood Shepherd (or Sheppard), Lady Catherine Hyde, Down Hall, and other persons and things connected with Prior are characteristically full and amusing, while the frequent footnotes must not pass without a word of praise.

F. RYLAND.

Diaries of Sir Moses and Lady Montefiore.
Edited by Dr. L. Loewe. In 2 vols.
(Griffith, Farran & Co.)

THE scale upon which this biography has been constructed is in proportion rather to the life of its chief subject than to the importance of the events chronicled. The two things by which Sir Moses will be most remembered are his longevity and his philanthropy, the latter exercised in the best spirit and directed—chiefly, but not exclusively—towards the advancement of his own nation's welfare. He was a high-minded man and an excellent citizen, but scarcely a great man.

The principles which with admirable consistency he maintained throughout his long life are conspicuous in his last will and testament, and it would be easy to deduce from that document a very trustworthy estimate of the leading features in his character. The pious reference to his parents with which it begins is followed by a grateful acknowledgment of the happiness of his married state and the blessings of the long life which he had enjoyed. His first care is to enrich the synagogue and college at Ramsgate, which he had founded in memory of his wife ; next to relieve "learned and necessitous Jews of every congregation residing in the Holy City of Jerusalem," and in each of the cities of Safed, Hebron, and Tiberias. Then the wants of other Jewish communities are remembered ; then hospitals, orphanages, and dispensaries, open alike to Jew and Gentile, are recognised ; and, lastly, "the principal officiating ministers" of certain parishes in the Isle of Thanet and of the Roman Catholic Church nearest to him are made the almoners of his bounty towards the poor.

The breadth of his sympathies, as well as his power of giving practical expression to them out of a large income, combined to render Sir Moses very popular ; but he has a special claim to the gratitude of all friends of liberty. Early in life he set himself the noble task of securing for his own nation those municipal and political rights and privileges from which, even in England, they were still debarred. His own election to the office of Sheriff of London and Middlesex in 1837 was the first of a series of successes ; and the entry in his Diary under date November 9, 1837—the day upon which he received the honour of knighthood—is very characteristic :

"With unspeakable but heartfelt gratitude to the Almighty God I note the occurrences of the day, a day that can never be forgotten by me : it is a proud one : with the exception of the day I had the happiness of dedicating our synagogue at Ramsgate and the day of my wedding—the proudest day of my life. I trust the honour conferred by our most gracious Queen on myself and on my dear Judith may prove the harbinger of future good to the Jews generally, and though I am sensible of my unworthiness, yet I pray the Almighty to lead and guide me in the proper path, that I may observe and keep His Holy law."

The first visit paid by Sir Moses to the Holy Land was in 1839, his sympathies having been warmly aroused by the accounts that had reached him of the sad condition of the Jews in Jerusalem and, indeed, throughout Palestine. While ministering to the immediate necessities of his poorer brethren, he kept before him the special project for regenerating the land by means of a large immigration of Jews from other countries. In this plan he seems to have retained both interest and confidence until the end of his life. He lived to see seven agricultural colonies established in various parts of the Holy Land ; while in America—in Pratt county, Kansas—a settlement of Jewish refugees from all lands adopted the name of "Montefiore," out of respect to the great benefactor of their race. His exertions in their defence—especially in Russia, Morocco, Roumania, and Persia—were unremitting and, as a rule, successful ; but in the Mostara case—now almost forgotten—he was no match for Cardinal Antonelli.

Dr. Loewe, the editor of this biography, was the constant and intimate companion of Sir Moses during the greater part of his life. It is, therefore, not surprising that he should have desired to preserve as many particulars as possible of a life ennobled, as he knew, by public and private virtues of a rare order. Sir Moses Montefiore was a man of whom any nation might be proud ; but, though a "Hebrew of Hebrews," he owed, we venture to think, some of his love of liberty and hatred of oppression to the air of England and the institutions with which he was there surrounded.

CHARLES J. ROBINSON.

Arabic Authors : a Manual of Arabian History and Literature. By F. F. Arbuthnot. (Heinemann.)

In his preface the author remarks : "The book itself may be useful, not, perhaps, to the professor or to the orientalist, but to the general reader and to the student commencing the study of Arabic." Even to the professor and orientalist, however, Arabic Authors must prove of utility as a handy book of reference ; and Mr. Arbuthnot undoubtedly deserves much praise for the gallant attempt which he has made to popularise the knowledge of Arabic literature in England.

It is, indeed, amazing that there should not have existed ere now a guide-book to the rich fields of Arabic literature and history. Little or nothing is known in this country—if we exclude the very small contingent of Arabic scholars—of the works of the great Arab writers, who, in truth, may compare not unfavourably with the Greek and Latin classics. It is irritating, as well as amusing, to be asked "whether there are any books in Arabic worth reading besides the 'Koran' and 'The Arabian Nights Entertainments.'" Prof. J. D. Carlyle, of Cambridge, did, it is true, produce in 1796 a work called Specimens of Arabian Poetry, in which he gave the originals, together with an English verse translation ; but, with the exception of two or three pieces, the "specimens" are an exceedingly poor selection, and hardly a line of the Arabic is free from errors of spelling or metre. The English translation, moreover, is not all that could be desired. Other and better works on Arabic poetry have appeared since. Sir J. W. Redhouse rendered good service in his Arabian Poetry for English Readers ; and Ancient Arabian Poetry, by Mr. C. J. Lyall, gives a very excellent idea of some of the poets before Muhammad. But poetry alone does not constitute Arabic literature. Hence any attempt to give some idea of the treasures which exist in the storehouse of Arab learning must be welcomed with pleasure; and one cannot be too thankful to Mr. Arbuthnot for having compiled a work which should attract a large number of people to the field of Arab poetry, science, philosophy, and history.

The fact that Mr. Arbuthnot has been the first to produce a manual of Arabic literature shields the work from severe handling, and blunts, so to speak, the edge of criticism. Nevertheless, it is to be regretted that more time and care have not been bestowed upon the work. In the first place, it is impossible in a book of 234 pages of large print to deal—in however condensed a manner—with the most extensive of all living Oriental literatures. Moreover, out of the 234 pages only ninety-six are devoted, strictly speaking, to literature. One chapter is historical, another treats of Muhammad, and two more are given over to tales, stories, and anecdotes. The result is, that serious omissions are made; and a number of the best authors are scamped over rapidly, while others of less note are favoured with longer passages. Among the former one finds, as an example, Ibn-ul-Athir, who is regarded by most educated Muhammadans as the greatest of Arab historians and the one best acquainted with the traditions. His book, Al-Kāmil, apart from the mass of information which it contains—especially regarding Muhammad and Islam—is one of the finest specimens of Arabic prose. More space should also have been given to Abutammam, Al-Mutanabbi, Al-Hariri, and the other great poets and writers. Some selected specimens and quotations from the works of these authors would have been infinitely more serviceable than the stories from the Arabian Nights. The above-mentioned writers may be regarded as the Arab Shakespeares, Miltons, Drydens, Popes, &c.; while, comparatively speaking, the Arabian Nights is equivalent to Gulliver's Travels or Robinson Crusoe.

Another proof of the hastiness with which the book has been put together is the number of misprints, particularly in the transliteration of Arab names. This, of course, is not of the first importance. Nevertheless, a work of the kind, which is to serve as a guide-book to Arabic literature, should be free, or almost free, from such errors, especially where every vowel-point in Arabic, represented in English by a vowel-letter, has the power of entirely changing the meaning of a word. For instance, Maghrib is given as Mughrib, Al-'Asma'i as Al-Asmai, As-saffah (the blood-shedder) as As-saffah, and so forth.

In the historical chapter the author makes no mention of the houses of Idris, Aghlab, Hamdāni, and others who played important parts in the history of the Arab Empire. The Mamluk dynasty in Egypt is also curiously passed over.

In the chapter on Muhammad one cannot help regretting that the author did not confine himself to giving the facts which are known regarding the great founder of Islam, and leave his comments on the comparative merits of religion for another occasion. Several pages are devoted to Abraham, Moses, and Buddha; and there is a long speculative dissertation on the Bible and Christianity, which is wholly out of place in a manual of Arabic literature. Objection may also be taken to certain expressions which the author makes use of—e.g., the term “man of business”—which occurs somewhat frequently in the chapter on Muhammad—is hardly a suitable or dignified term to apply to the great founders of a religion. There are other sentences “which might be put differently.” On p. 135, the author writes, “once at Madinah, Muhammad became a personage.” Again, on p. 137, “He (Muhammad) further married the widows of some of his followers killed in battle, perhaps pour encourager les autres.”

These things are pointed out in the hope that the author may feel disposed, in a future edition, to consider the desirability of a careful revision and enlargement, which would greatly enhance its value. There are many proofs that the author has given much pains to the book—a little more would make it all that can be desired.

One more matter must be referred to, and that is the revival of the “Old Oriental Translation Fund,” to which Mr. Arbuthnot alludes in his preface. This fund was started in 1828, but eventually collapsed from want of support. Such an institution is, assuredly, greatly needed for the purpose of inducing scholars to undertake the translation of Oriental works, which will prove of immense benefit to future students. It is most earnestly to be hoped, therefore, that the scheme of resuscitating the fund will meet with the success which it deserves; and if Mr. Arbuthnot can further the undertaking in any way, he will certainly earn the gratitude of all Oriental scholars.

H. ANTHONY SALMONÉ.

Early Reviews of Great Writers (1786-1832).
Selected and Edited, with an Introduction,
by E. Stevenson. (Walter Scott.)

To read the opinions which our forefathers expressed about the literature of their day is often amusing. It also throws much light on the growth and varying character of literary criticism. Mr. Stevenson provides a certain amount of material of this description, drawn chiefly from the period when the Edinburgh and Quarterly were young. He seems to be under the impression that, in this country, there was little or no literary criticism worth the name earlier than the present century. This is surely a mistake. Literary criticism was fully a century old when the Edinburgh was born. Mr. Stevenson does make a passing allusion to the Mercurius Librarius of 1680. He might also have mentioned that Dryden in the Dedication of the Translation of Juvenal and Persius (1692) took occasion to review Milton. This, however, was only casual. A little later, in Steele's periodicals, there are unmistakable indications of literary criticism. For instance, in the Tatler, No. 6, Steele himself, in the person of his lady friend, “Sappho,” discusses briefly the relative merits of Dryden and Milton, “two of our greatest poets.” Steele, however, was far better as an observer of men and social manners than as an examiner of books; and this description of work fell mainly to his friend, Addison. The famous essays on Milton's Paradise Lost, which may fairly be regarded as the starting point of literary criticism, are not mentioned by Mr. Stevenson. They are not “dismal summaries from which every particle of interest the original possessed has entirely evaporated” (Introduction, p. vii.). Truly there is little likeness between Addison's literary essays in the Spectator for 1712, and the sedate reviews of books to be found in the Spectator's delightfully dogmatic namesake of to-day. Perhaps the only resemblance is in the unquestionable sincerity of both. Yet, so far advanced in their art were the critics of Queen Anne's time, that at least one clear instance of log-rolling is to be found in the Tatler.

There was no considerable development of criticism during the remainder of the eighteenth century, yet Dr. Johnson's name should not have been entirely omitted from Mr. Stevenson's essay. To make no mention of Coleridge is to try and play “Hamlet” without the Prince of Denmark. In this country, the impetus which made the following age an age of criticism came from Coleridge. Even when the Edinburgh reviewers had only just begun their ruthless work, Coleridge, in the pages of the Friend, was giving to the world specimens of true criticism. That generation did not benefit much by his teaching, for it paid little heed to him; but he did not speak in vain. For the time, what may be termed the Billingsgate school of criticism absorbed attention. The blunders in judgment of this school were its least fault; its greatest was its insincerity. Not truth, but pique, vanity, and other self-seeking too often guided the pens which, in those days, wrote the Edinburgh, the Quarterly, and Blackwood. Yet among the Edinburgh reviewers, though not of them, was Thomas Carlyle, the successor of Coleridge—the stormful Elisha, somewhat given to cursing, upon whom the mantle of a greater prophet had proved but an imperfect fit. Despite its excesses, or, perhaps, partly in consequence of them, that critical outburst was of great service to literature. It caused an awakening—effectual, if rude. Byron had good reason to thank it, for, in the words of Alexander Smith, it “stung the author into a poet.” Many others besides Byron were stung into doing their best, so that, if they could not win praise, they should not deserve blame. Then, when the force of the Billingsgate school was spent, came the higher criticism which Coleridge had revealed and of which Hazlitt and Leigh Hunt, and, at a later stage, Matthew Arnold, were notable exponents. The Westminster Review, and afterwards the London Review, were praiseworthy attempts to retain the good features and discard the bad of the older quarterlies. The Westminster boldly undertook to review, not only literature generally, but the other reviews. The London appeared a little later than the date at which Mr. Stevenson limits his work, and he does not mention it. That date marks no epoch in the history of periodical literature or of criticism, and in the absence of any explanation it seems arbitrary. The intention of these later reviews was admirable, and was honestly carried into effect; but what they gained over their seniors in grace they lost in force.

To understand the original value of old reviews, it is necessary to bear well in mind the time and circumstances of their production. Books of the hour, which may have been praised, quite properly, by contemporary critics, will seem but poor work to readers of following generations. They have served their purpose—a good purpose probably, and well served—but it was a strictly passing and temporary purpose. Those dull sermons of the last century, of which Mr. Stevenson makes mention, which engaged the chief attention of the critics at the time, were not so dull to the men who first saw them as they must be to us. Perhaps the critics who reviewed them were right; for the critics wrote for the hour, and not in the least for after-time. On the other hand, the fact that the Gentleman's Magazine for 1749 "takes no notice of Tom Jones beyond recording the publication and inserting a few lines in its praise from an anonymous admirer," is not quite such a flagrant blunder as at first sight it might seem to be. For Tom Jones, unlike the sermons, is far more valuable to us than it was or could have been to Fielding's contemporaries.

WALTER LEWIN.

THE LATIN POEMS ATTRIBUTED TO ST. BERNARD.

Des Poèmes Latins attribués à Saint Bernard.
Par B. Haureau. (Paris: Klincksieck.)

THIS is an entertaining and instructive guide to one of the byways of bibliography. M. Haureau goes through all the MSS. which contain in whole, or in part, the poems attributed to St. Bernard, whether those MSS. attribute them to him or no; in the few cases where the attribution is due to early editors, there is, of course, even less hesitation in reaching a negative conclusion.

M. Haureau is not quite impartial; he is a little too ready to argue from the premises that St. Bernard, who always wrote well in prose, can never have written weak or insignificant verse. A great deal, if not the bulk, of St. Teresa's verse is very far below her intense and fiery prose. There are also one or two mistakes which are surprising in a really learned writer. On p. 91 two poems to St. Mary are rejected, on the ground that they teach the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception, which St. Bernard did not hold. Neither of them teaches it; they teach instead the highest doctrine held by devout Dominicans and St. Bernard. Now and again, too, M. Haureau seems to undervalue what he rejects on sound critical grounds; for instance, he says truly of the well-known rhythm on the Most Holy Name:

"Si longue qu'elle soit, elle n'offre aucun trait original. L'inspiration en est pieuse, d'une piété vive et soutenue, mais, ce qui fait le mérite d'un poème, l'invention, le charme du style, le judicieux emploi de figures, tout cela manque dans cette amplification mystique."

No doubt Adam of St. Victor is much cleverer, nor can we deny his claim to be inspired by "une piété vive et soutenue"; but, after all, he is less rapturous.

The most generally interesting feature in the book is that hardly any of the poems falsely attributed to St. Bernard were composed from a desire to trade upon his reputation. It is always the latest MSS. which contain the attribution; a great many rest on a single MS. at Reichenau, written long after the Benedictine order had ceased for a time to be learned. Some of the attributions are in a sort of way ingenious. For instance, one series of verses on the contempt of the world are supposed to have been addressed to the saint's brother; and when these proved ineffectual, another medley of precepts of good behaviour were supposed to have been strung together for his guidance in the world that he would not forsake. Naturally a poem on the decline of the Cistercian order after the rise of the Mendicants was first composed in the person of St. Bernard and afterwards ascribed to him. Not the least interesting part of the book is the preface, which clears up a misapprehension and establishes a curious fact. It is often said that no poem by St. Bernard can be genuine, because the Cistercians were forbidden, on pain of expulsion, to write "rhythmic." But, in the first place, the prohibition dates from some forty years after St. Bernard's death; in the second place, it applied not to "metrical" poems or hymns, but to the rhythmical Carmina Burana; in the third place, St. Bernard (as M. Haureau informs us on the authority of a contemporary apologist for Abelard) had a reputation for satiric verse in his youth at Cîteaux, of which at the time he was jealous.

NEW NOVELS.

The Aztec Treasure-House. By THOS. A. Janvier. (Harpers.)

A Plunge into Space. By Robert Cromie. (Frederick Warne.)

As the Tide Turns. By Mary E. Hullah. (Ward & Downey.)

Having and Holding. In 3 vols. By J. E. Pantan. (Trischler.)

Heart Wins, and other Stories. By several Authors. (Trischler.)

City and Suburban. By Florence Warden. (White.)

It is a perilous thing nowadays for a new writer to come forward with a treasure-trove romance. The thing has been done so often that even boys are beginning to become scrupulous in their acceptance of what is so plentifully offered. They do not object to treasure, but they no longer wish to discover it vicariously on a desert island or behind the Mountains of the Moon. They are still, no doubt they always will be, delighted to hear of adventurous quest of a less conventional kind. It is very seldom, indeed, that one meets a romance of this sort and leaves it with any wish to return to the pages which were fascinating enough during perusal. There are very few authors who, like Herman Melville or Sheridan Le Fanu or Robert Louis Stevenson, can tell a simple narrative in such a way that a potent spell remains after the tale is told, as there are certain blooms to which the bees return thrice, or oftener, without exhausting undiscovered stores of honey. The Aztec Treasure-House is one of those rare books which will withstand the severe test of a second reading. This is not Mr. Janvier's first attempt, though it is, so far as I am aware, much the longest and, in a secondary sense, most ambitious piece of work that he has done. At the same time, it would be unfair to compare it with his delightful Colour Studies, every page, every line of which was carefully wrought ere finally sent to press. His treasure-story is an exciting narrative, where succinctness, directness, and swift movement are the primary virtues. Mr. Janvier is an admirable story-teller, and certainly none the less because he is content to relate his tale of wild adventure in language as simple and vivid as that of Defoe. A strange and exciting tale it unquestionably is; and it is rendered the more interesting to those who are aware of the fact that Dr. Carl Lumholtz, the well-known Scandinavian explorer of Australia, has just organised an expedition to go in search of an alleged remnant of the ancient Aztec nation supposed to be dwelling in remote security in the unexplored wilds of the Sierra Madre in Northern Mexico. It was Mr. James Payn, if I remember rightly, who complained of Nature grossly plagiarising a startling incident in one of his novels. If anything comes of Dr. Lumholtz's expedition, Mr. Janvier may claim the credit of having, at least, been his prophet. There are some scenes of exceptional power in The Aztec Treasure-House, though the author is most successful where his work does not challenge comparison with that of an eminent living teller of the marvellous. The story is one of fascinating interest from first to last; nor does it lack a certain lofty touch in the delineation of the noble and heroic priest, Fray Antonio. Mr. Janvier is familiar with Mexico and with Mexican life, literature, and traditionary lore, so that the reader has an added pleasure in yielding to the spell of one of the most delightful romances of adventure of the season. A word of praise may be added for the score of interesting and well-engraved illustrations which accompany the text.

If mere extravagance of conception and extraordinariness of adventure were the prime essentials of a romance, A Plunge into Space would deserve exceptionally high rank. But, in addition, characters must be vividly and truly drawn, and a narrative must be told with literary as well as inventive skill; and in these two important respects Mr. Robert Cromie falls short. Had it been otherwise, his story of a trip to Mars would at least have been an enjoyable, and might have been a remarkable tale. As it is, one can only say that he is but a faulty follower of recognised masters of fantastic fiction, most notably of Jules Verne. In several respects A Plunge into Space is little more than an adaptation of A Trip to the Moon; but while M. Jules Verne invariably makes the reader believe for the time being, not merely in the adventures he describes, but in the reality of the personages who take part therein, Mr. Cromie seems quite unable to animate his puppets with a breath of real human life. It is a suggestive circumstance that the only character at all ably depicted—and that but shadowily—is Mignonette, the charming half-sprite, half-woman of the planet Mars. The story begins well, then flags, then, by virtue of the author's skill and inventive faculty, becomes even exciting, then again flags continually till the weak and disillusionising close. Some of the seemingly strangest circumstances in this story simulate scientific truths; as, for instance, how a daring engineer constructed a huge steel ball (having first discovered the occult secret of the law of gravitation, and how to control the action of that law), wherein, at the rate of 50,000 miles a minute, he and his companions reach Mars, and see many delightful and fearsome things. Mr. Bellamy and Jules Verne in collaboration might have succeeded where Mr. Cromie, gallantly enough, has failed.

As the Tide Turns is an almost plotless story. The author briefly relates the swift wooing of a charming and unconventional young actress by a rather priggish and very conventional young man, and their subsequent betrothal and early married life. The girl, Lily, by her freshness and naturalness, saves the book. She is a living creature, which most of the other personages are not, being merely reflections of certain types familiar in fiction—well-worn properties, as Lily Dubury would call them, in the language of "the Profession" to which she was so devoted. Paul Ogburn is a muff on the stage, an excellent fellow as a lover, and an absurdity as a husband. He is not a man, but a puppet; and, if the author will excuse the critic for saying so, even as a puppet markedly the handiwork of a woman. There are good things in the tale, though the writer's lack of practical knowledge of stage-life is obvious again and again; but her success is solely with the heroine and one or two of the minor personages. The polite society-sinner, Mr. Emson Phillips, the jealous and scheming Virginia Ogburn, are so familiar that one has almost a kindly feeling for such hard-worked types, venerable by reason of their great age. It is in keeping with their reappearance that the heir to the family estate of the Ogburns is, along with his children, opportunely drowned; so that Paul becomes a wealthy squire, and develops a dislike of the stage and "low company." But the chief fault of As the Tide Turns is its hopelessly weak ending. It would not be fair to disclose it; but the sentimental maiden, mentally nurtured upon the stories of Miss Wetherell and her kind, can cordially be recommended to expend her sympathies upon the foolishly conventional close of a pleasant enough though commonplace story.

Mrs. Pantan's new novel suffers from the common scourge of fiction—a plethora of words. If the work were one half—one third rather—of its present length, both author and readers would have cause for congratulation. When all is said that has to be said, one turns away for something to occupy one's mind, as after a long railway journey, which has been saved from complete tediousness only by a few delightful or at least suggestive and interesting glimpses of life and scenery. It is the fault of a system, of course; and so long as the barbaric three-volume régime exists, so long will novelists exploit their talent in industrious word-spinning at the expense of art. Having and Holding, if no better, is certainly no worse than the majority of the multitude of books to which it bears so paralysing a resemblance. The author often proves herself a keen-eyed observer of life; and though her style is frequently faulty, she writes generally with directness and "go"—no slight recommendation, as those who have perforce had to read much fiction will most readily admit. Mrs. Pantan is at her best in the third volume of her story, where there is very much less padding than elsewhere. It is a pleasant, wholesome tale, and no doubt profoundly interesting for those who delight in the details of political life under its social aspects.

The collection of ten short tales included in the volume entitled after the first of the series, "Heart Wins"—which, as well as the second, "The Australian Aunt," is by Mrs. Alexander—may afford pleasant entertainment for idlers comfortably lounging under green trees or on sandy sea-shores. Most if not all the stories have, if I am not mistaken, already appeared in Christmas annuals. None is worthy of particular attention. They are "readable"—a merciful word, which may mean much or little; more than this cannot be said for them.

The latest production of Florence Warden must disappoint even the easy-going lovers of The House on the Marsh. It is vulgar in tone, and in every way a slipshod performance. In a desert of banality there is, however, at least one good phrase: the term "sentimental vertigo," as applied to girls who yoke themselves to unsuitable mates from sheer weakness of will. But a good phrase does not redeem a stupid plot and a commonplace style. To do the author justice, she has a certain dramatic vigour which some may take for power.

WILLIAM SHARP.

SOME ECONOMICAL BOOKS.

The Industrial Progress of the Nation. By Edward Atkinson. (Putnam's.) Mr. Edward Atkinson is not only an unrivalled statistician, but also an ardent theorist:

"In all problems," he truly says, "in what is called political economy, which are commonly regarded as relating wholly to the production and distribution of the material substances constituting wealth and necessary to material existence, one is inevitably brought back to the immaterial or metaphysical."

Of the two branches thus indicated, the material rather than the transcendental seems to be the writer's forte. We are entirely at one with him as long as he takes his stand on facts and figures; but we find a difficulty in following him when he ascends into the region of the metaphysical, or—if we might coin a word appropriate to his method—the meta-statistical. The basis of his reasoning is solid matter of fact; the progress of the American nation evidenced by the increasing quantity of material wealth which the bulk of the people can command. First, it is ascertained by copious statistics in what proportion the average American citizen expends his income on the different objects of his consumption. Then, taking account on the one hand of the prices of these articles at different epochs, on the other hand of changes in money wages, we deduce how much more kit and rations the average man of any class can purchase now than at a former period. The increase of real wages thus evidenced is very striking. Comparing the years 1885 and 1886 with 1865, we find that the purchasing power of the working-classes distributed into four sections has increased by leaps and bounds which are expressed by the respective percentages 108, 90, 78, 66. But not only does the wage-earner's fund thus increase, but also he obtains an increasing share of the total produce. This share, Mr. Atkinson assures us, is as much as 90 per cent. of that total which some economists call the wages-interest-and-profit fund. We confess that this statement wears to us an unlikely look, and we are not surprised that it has been challenged. But Mr. Atkinson sticks to his guns, nor do we care to encounter him on this field. It is at any rate a more inferential statement that the wage-earners obtain not only a large, but an increasing, proportion of the total. The writer himself seems to admit that there is some assumption in the proposition that wealth is becoming more evenly distributed, large fortunes, however conspicuous, becoming relatively insignificant. We reach a stage which may be called metaphysical when the disadvantage of inequalities comes into question. According to Mr. Atkinson, Vanderbilt well earned his millions. He was cheap at the money. In fact, he was regarded as "the great communist of the time," in that he reduced the cost of moving food. Perhaps so. But how about the young Vanderbilts who inherit what the Commodore—we should say Communist—earned? Mr. Atkinson seems very imperfectly to appreciate the position of men like the eminent Prof. Adolph Wagner, who go so far with the Socialists as to admit that the inequalities of inheritance and opportunity considerably mar the alleged fairness of the competitive regime. Such writers would dispute Mr. Atkinson's repeated assertion that "each man may be held to make his own rate of wages as well as his own rate of profits by the measure of individual intelligence which he is able to devote to the occupation in which he is engaged."

From Mr. Atkinson's optimistic point of view there is so little room for improvement in the distribution of wealth that all the projected reforms put together are not likely to be so serviceable as some invention in the art of cookery—perhaps the new stove which is the subject of one of his discourses:

"Can the anarchist, the communist, the socialist, the protectionist, the free trader, the co-operator, the paper-money man, the knight of labour, the eight hours' man, or the sentimentalist invent or suggest any other method of changing the direction of the industry of the whole community which would on the whole be so effective in improving the conditions of all as one which would save five cents a day on food and fuel?"

Perhaps not; but we do not think that Mr. Atkinson's method of arguing is likely to convert any of these sectaries. He evinces too little intellectual sympathy with those from whom he differs; he has too great a contempt for his opponents when he flourishes as a triumphant argument against the whole class of reformers the truism that "we cannot have more than all there is"—that the share of any claimant cannot exceed the total to be distributed. He does not realise that even the Socialists now have some acquaintance with the elements of political economy. To those who have studied Prof. Alfred Marshall's Economics of Industry, Mr. Atkinson's statistical refutation of Malthus will not teach any general truth which is not much better expressed in the words of the widely-read text-book to which we have alluded: "The progress of civilisation, while it presses on the resources of land, enlarges those resources." The academic bimetallicists will make short of our author's currency theories:

"If the true cause of the reduction in prices has been an appreciation or rise in the value of the metal, gold . . . would not the price of real estate have also been affected in the same way [reduced in price]?"

The eminent statistician can hardly be supposed to adopt the argument of those who are so little conversant with the theory of averages as to lay it down that there cannot be a general fall of prices if any particular price is found to have risen. As if one could not detect a fall in temperature in November as compared with October, although Guy Fawkes Day might happen to be warmer than the 5th October. The writer proceeds:

"Again, if the cause of the reduction in prices had been an increased scarcity of gold, would not capital, when measured by the gold standard, have been able to secure to itself a constantly increasing rate of interest or income?"

Surely, if a summary statement is to be made on this subject, it is the well-known theory of Hume—that the rate of interest is unaffected by the level of prices and the quantity of money. No doubt, it may be maintained that if we look to discount transactions a diminution in the metallic currency is apt to be accompanied with a tightening money market. But ought so delicate and disputed a point to be dismissed in a sentence? Probably Mr. Atkinson is much more conversant with the phenomena of the money market than his critics. We are sensible that great weight attaches to his authority. "We ought to attend," says Aristotle, "even to the undemonstrated opinions of the practically wise." We only say that his manner of advocacy is not persuasive. But, even if his reasoning were really as loose as according to us it only appears to be, it would still be invidious to fasten upon the theories of one whose facts are so valuable. It is not to be expected that all statisticians should comply with the motto of the London Statistical Society, Aliis extereundum. To those who have laboriously reaped the harvest of facts it would be unreasonable to deny the amusement of threshing it in their own fashion. To mix our metaphor, it would be like muzzling the ox which treads out the corn. We are far from wishing to muzzle the statistician, even when he discourses on subjects so far ultra crepidam as Life and Religion. Our readers will inquire anxiously what is the result of Mr. Atkinson's meditation on these subjects. He has discovered "the law of harmony of the universe," and the principle of "the mutual inter-dependence of men," which, being interpreted by the general tenor of the book, we take to come to much the same as that complacent optimism which Continental writers nickname "Smithianismus."

First Lessons in Political Economy. By Francis A. Walker. (Macmillan.) "This book has been prepared for use in high schools and academies," says President Walker in his preface. He is confident that it is as easy to teach political economy as geometry or quadratic equations to students of ages from fifteen to seventeen years. Perhaps he has not sufficiently considered the difficulties which the speculative character of economical science presents. Otherwise, he might have hesitated to insert in these First Lessons his own theory of profits, which has been disputed by many writers, in particular by Prof. Alfred Marshall in his recent authoritative work on the Principles of Economics. Surely only the quod ubique et quod ab omnibus should be inserted in a manual designed for use in high schools and academies. The risk of thus unduly accentuating some particular feature may be regarded as a price that must be paid for the advantage of having an educational book written by an original investigator. It appears to us that the advantage is worth the cost, both in general, and, in particular, in the case of President Walker, who adds to rare scientific genius an unrivalled power of exposition.

Occam's Razor. By F. W. Bain. (Parker.) The title of the book and the surname of the author suggest metaphysical speculation and psychological science. Such is not exactly the character of Mr. F. W. Bain's philosophy; nor is it easy to define the general principle which, as the secondary title purports, is applied "to political economy, to the conditions of progress, to Socialism, to politics." The razor of this new Occam appears to us to be edged with keen wit, and to be finished and mounted with consummate literary workmanship. But an instrument of a different calibre is required to cut through the hard grain of economical matter of fact. In the essay entitled "That Political Economy is not a Science," the writer argues from the extraordinary assumption that "Certainly, if there be a science of economics, Mr. M. has got it," naming an author who, however original, can hardly be regarded as typical and representative. Mr. Bain fixes on the very tenet which has provoked dissent on the part of received authorities; namely, the opinion that instruments of exchange form part of wealth, or rather the suggestion that in estimating the magnitude of wealth instruments of credit should count pari passu with commodities. This is the quod est absurdum of Mr. Bain's reasoning; and his Q.E.D. is that "Economy must always be merely provisional and palliative, practical and not theoretic, based on no final summing-up, but on comparison and balance, on the lines laid down by such writers as Adam Smith, Sir Henry Maine, Cliffe Leslie, and Ingram."

Flushed with the triumph over Mr. M, the new Occam proceeds to cut up the Socialists—"Marx and Lassalle—the Moses and Aaron of the modern socialist dispensation." "The gigantic fallacy of Marx and the Socialists is that, of the four Aristotelian causes, they leave out all but the one, namely, the efficient cause, the labourer." Upon the principle of setting one dialectician to entrap another, this polemic against Marx is not without effect. It is unfortunate for the reputation of Ricardo that his name should have been dragged into this controversy. For Mr. F. Bain has thus been led, aliud agens, and with a side sweep of his razor, to demolish "that system of political economy which Ricardo formulated, and Mill made popular." The confutation of the Socialists is completed in the essay entitled "The Idea of a Patriot State"—a vindication of conservative principles in a letter to a noble lord. The author does not indite this letter in propria persona. It purports to be written by some Tory veteran, who seems to bear a family resemblance to the hero of Locksley Hall in his senility, or to either of the dramatis personae in Southey's Colloquies; of whom Macaulay said that they were "equally eloquent, equally angry, equally unreasonable, and equally given to talking about what they do not understand." Like Southey, Mr. Bain provokes comparison with Mr. Burke; whose Letter to a Noble Lord this essay may recall my points of resemblance less superficial than the title. Not inaptly, writes the modern apologist of conservatism:

"All these fine speculators, all these Socialists, Radicals, and other vain theoretical projectors are in a wild-goose chase. . . . They are all trying to reduce to a single principle facts and circumstances that differ infinitely among themselves."

But of the true statesman he says:

"His end and supreme law is salus publica, his means are caution, delicacy, hesitation."

Literary ornaments not less brilliant, and a stuff of thought, as it appears to us, more solid than in the other essays, are found in the article on "Conditions of Progress." The thesis is that progress is not to be expected from the struggle between men for existence. Population is one of the entities which are not to be multiplied beyond necessity. The argument that survival of the fittest in a régime of competition does not make for righteousness is illustrated by many striking reflections.

"Nature with reason has an aim, an ideal towards which to strive, totally distinct from nature without it. Nature without it is daemonic, ruthless, immoral, and fills us with a certain dread. Who has not been startled at times when, as if awaking from a dream, it occurred to him to consider such fearful facts as a death-adder, a tiger, spiders, sharks, cancer, and the cholera? . . . It is not by the keen competition for existence, but by the substitution of higher ideals, that we have emerged from that treadmill of the damned, the seventeenth century. There is the lever which has slowly, slowly moved the world up. . . . Up out of the musty, evil-smelling dungeons of the middle ages to the surface of the earth and the light of day. We are not at the top yet. But, in spite of the nefarious struggling for existence which threatens to engulf us once more, we are rising, and by these means—the extirpation of ignorance, and the elevation of our ideals."

Mr. Bain has effected an "elevation of our ideals" by this brilliant essay. He will effect an "extirpation of ignorance" if he will study the standard works on the economical subjects which he has handled in the other essays. If he will consult Prof. Sidgwick (Principles of Political Economy), he will find that all his difficulties about value in exchange and "intrinsic worth" have been anticipated. By converse with a philosophic intellect applied to political economy this young writer will also learn what deference is due to Ricardo and the mighty ones of old. He will sharpen upon the grindstone of the economic classics the razor with which he has now vainly attempted to perform the feat of Accus Maevius.

Political Economy; or, the Science of the Market. By F. W. Newman. (Kegan Paul & Co.) The announcement in the Preface that the lectures on Political Economy, which form more than half of this volume, "were delivered in 1850-51 to ladies in the Bedford Square College," has rather a chilling effect. Ladies and political economy have both advanced so much during the last generation that the lectures addressed to our mothers may be expected to be at least elementary, if not incorrect. Yet so far is genius ahead of its time that Mr. Newman's lectures delivered in 1851 prove to be fairly well abreast of the present advanced position of the science. Thus he had in effect adopted the important principle of Final Utility, which the present generation associates principally with the name of Jevons. Mr. Newman in his lecture on "Laws of Price" speaks, or rather spoke nearly forty years ago, of the "great and fruitful principle which is expressed by Mr. Banfield nearly as follows: If human wants be arranged in series beginning from the most urgent and proceeding to the less, the satisfaction of every lower want in the scale adds intensity to some higher want. Let us say that food and rags are more urgently needed than decent clothes, such clothes than useful furniture, and such furniture than pictures; then, so long as food is deficient, men eagerly part with everything but rags to buy it. . . . In 1842 in Manchester it was stated that no shops but the rag-shops could keep up their prices; yet that was a time of scarcity only, not famine."

And so on through the gamut of wants. In many other respects Mr. Newman's work is up to the present date. Thus, he well says that the "cost of production is different to different men. Those who have peculiar natural or artificial facilities may permanently get a price which gives them extraordinary gains."

When Mr. Newman does so well in the dry tree, in the case of lectures delivered so long ago, it will not be surprising that he does better in the more recent essays which form the latter part of the volume. These have been already published separately; most of them in Fraser's Magazine, but they well deserve republication. We may mention particularly "English Land Tenure" (1875), and "The Capitalist in Society" (referring to Mr. Holyoake's History of Co-operation).

The Industrial Competition of Asia; an Inquiry into the Influence of Currency on the Commerce of the Empire in the East. By CLERMONT J. DANIELL. (Kegan Paul & Co.) The prescription of this currency doctor is not bimetalism pure and simple, but the local use in India of gold and silver money exchanging with each other at their market values. He anticipates from this arrangement all the advantages which have been ascribed to the bimetallic system of the Latin Union. To clear the way for this project, the ordinary or "rated" bimetalism (to use Prof. Sidgwick's happy phrase) is assailed with many arguments, some new and some familiar. Prof. Alfred Marshall's reasoning that the low value of silver in gold has not acted as a bounty on exportations from India is reproduced and urged with much effect. The evidence of other experts taken by the present Gold and Silver Commission is carefully examined. The lay reader must not expect that the intricate reasonings on these abstract subjects can be followed without close attention. Here is a specimen:

"Silver in the trade with India is only a commodity used immediately to carry through the exchange of Indian for English productions. The silver money of India, regarded as the equivalent in value of Indian merchandise, is cheap in British goods, because the productions of India are cheap in those goods also. British goods being priced in gold, we do not talk of Indian silver being cheap in machinery, hardware, cottons, and so forth; but in the gold money which is the equivalent of their value. When, therefore, silver becomes dearer in gold than it is now, its cheapness in commodities will diminish correspondingly, because the rise in its value will follow on a rise in the value of Indian productions in British goods, or, which is the same thing, in English gold money. Upon this supposition we should expect Indian goods to rise higher in their silver price in India as silver rose in the gold valuation."

The chapter most interesting to the general reader is probably that which relates to the monetary history of India from the age of Solomon to the present time. The writer undertakes to prove that his professed reform is "sanctioned by custom of immemorial antiquity." He has evidently brought ability and great diligence to his difficult task. That such qualities have produced a useful result might be affirmed with safety if the subject were any other than currency.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MESSRS. LONGMANS are at once to publish a small volume by the late Dr. Edersheim, containing a collection of aphorisms and criticisms, something after the manner of Guesses at Truth. The volume will appear under the name by which Dr. Edersheim himself always used to refer to it, Tohu-sa Vohu ("Without Form and Void").

THE Shilling Selection from Robert Browning's Poems is to be a pocket edition, and will be issued next month.

MESSRS. BELL have in the press an edition of the first part of Goethe's Faust, edited on the same principle as Dr. Carlyle's edition of Dante's Inferno, giving the original text and a prose translation, with notes and introduction. The name of Prof. Buchheim, as editor, is sufficient guarantee that the volume will be a worthy addition to "Bohn's Standard Library," in which series it will be included.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN is about to publish a new series of biographies, entitled "Famous Musical Composers," illustrated with portraits. A special feature will be made of the composers of the nineteenth century, including such men as Brahms, Grieg, Rubenstein, &c.

A NEW book, by the Rev. John R. Vernon, author of "The Harvest of a Quiet Eye," will be issued shortly by Messrs. Cassell & Co. The title is Gleanings after Harvest; or, Idylls of the Home; and the volume consists of studies and sketches, some of which appear for the first time, the rest are revised reprints. It will be illustrated by Arthur Hopkins, Allan Barraud, and other artists.

A NEW work on The Island of Hayti, by the Rev. T. W. Herivel, is to be published very shortly by Mr. Elliot Stock. It will be fully illustrated.

THE reviewer of Prof. Chantepie de la Saussaye's Manual of the Science of Religion, in the last number of the ACADEMY, remarks, at the end of his highly-favourable review:

"At a time when the market is flooded with unreadable versions of obsolete German theology, it is perhaps too much to hope that this invaluable repertory of authentic information will soon be made more available for the use of English students."

We are glad to hear that this doubt is already falsified. Messrs. Longmans and Co. have undertaken to publish an English translation by Mrs. Colyer Fergusson, a daughter of Prof. Max Müller. Prof. Chantepie de la Saussaye has himself undertaken to revise the translation.

MR. WILLIAM ANDREWS, of Hull, is editing a volume to be entitled Bygone Lincolnshire, which will deal with the history, folklore, and memorable men and women of the county, and include many illustrations.

MR. ELKIN MATHEWS will publish in the course of next month a little volume of whimsical trifles, written jointly by Mr. Robinson K. Leather and Mr. Richard Le Gallienne—both of Liverpool. The title, The Student and the Body-Snatcher, is taken from the leading story.

DR. WIECK, of Coblenz, has undertaken to copy and edit for the Early English Text Society the curious prose collection of "Stories for Sermons" in the additional MS. 25,719 in the British Museum, engished in the first half of the fifteenth century from the Latin Alphabetum Narrationum—a set of tales of shocking disasters to sinners of divers kinds, regularly used for spicing sermons.

DR. THOMAS MILLER has just finished the text of his edition of the Anglo-Saxon of Bede's Ecclesiastical History. This will form Part I. of the work, which will be issued by the Early English Text Society. Part II. will contain full "apparatus criticus and glossary, with a conspectus of the dialectal peculiarities of all the MSS."

WYCLIF's most interesting Latin work turns out to be his Logica continuata. The Logica itself is as formal and dull as it can well be; but in its Continuation, says Mr. M. H. Dziewicki—who has just copied it and will edit it for the Wyclif Society—the reforming theologian, "writes about everything from anatomy to astronomy: he describes the human eye and the crystalline spheres, and goes into political economy, too, a little."

A COLLECTION of all the existing Copyright Laws and Treaties is being prepared by Mr. G. Hedeler, of Leipzig; and the first part, containing Germany, Austria, Switzerland, France, Italy, Great Britain, and the United States, will be published in a few days. This collection differs from all previous works of the kind on the one hand in containing the exact text of the enactments, and on the other in the omission of all obsolete matter.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN has ready, in a new artistic binding, the fourth edition of Footprints, by Mrs. Sarah Tytler. This book deals with the natural creation, and especially with English scenery, in a simple manner, with the assistance of numerous illustrations.

DR. STALKER'S Imago Christi is being translated into German, and the same author's Life of Christ into Portuguese.

MR. EDWARD SALMON has this week assumed editorial control of Yarns, incorporating Tit for Tat; and among the new features he has introduced are a series of letters to eminent men by "Observer," and a free gift of books weekly. Instead of reviewing a book in the ordinary way, it is merely mentioned, and the reader who sends in the best reason why he should have it gets it, the reason being published.

FOLLOWING up their plan of presenting complete copies of well-known works of fiction to the readers of Cassell's Saturday Journal, the publishers intend to give away with Nos. 365 and 366, ready on September 24 and October 1 respectively, the story of adventure by "Q.," called "Dead Man's Rock."

THE eleventh volume of the new edition of De Quincey's Collected Writings (Edinburgh: A. & C. Black) continues and concludes the essays in literary theory and criticism. They may be said to deal with three periods of literature: (1) English writers of the eighteenth century, from Swift to Junius; (2) the modern Germans—Lessing, Goethe, and Jean Paul Richter; and (3) some of De Quincey's own contemporaries, including Shelley, Keats, and Landor. We observe that the editor, Prof. David Masson, refuses to reprint De Quincey's early review of Carlyle's translation of Wilhelm Meister, on the ground that De Quincey had deliberately omitted it from his Collected Writings.

In further illustration of Chaucer's Prioress's "Nun-Chaplain," Mr. F. D. Matthew, the well-known Wyclif editor, sends us the following extracts from Dr. Jessopp's Norwich Visitations, published last year for the Camden Society:

Visitation of Ridningfield Nunnery, August 7, 1514.

"Domina Johanna Deyne inquisita, dicit quod . . . priorissa non mutavit capellanam a tempore praefectionis, &c.," p. 138.

"Item quod mutet capellanam citra festum Michaelis proximum," p. 140.

Visitation of Flixton Nunnery.

"Domina Margareta Punder nuper priorissa dicit quod . . . priorissa non habet sororem in capellanam, sed sola cubat ad placitum in cubiculo extra dormitorium absque testimonio sororis continue."

Injunctiones.

"Dominus Cancellarius injunxit priorissae. . . . Item quod de cetero priorissa habeat secum testimonium unius sororis loco capellane, maxime quando cubat extra dormitorium," p. 191.

Correction.—Owing to the non-return of a proof, the name of the author of the drama, Stanley, reviewed in the ACADEMY of last week, was misprinted. It should have been Mr. E. L. Thornely. Also, for "dead," in the first line of the last verse of the lyric quoted, read "dread."

ORIGINAL VERSE.

A STONY WAY.

"I am thankful now,
Mute, passive, acquiescent, I receive,
And bless God simply."

R. BROWNING (In a Balcony).

You are so far above me; yet I stand
And watch your upward way,
I know the path is stony that you tread;
You strive, and toil, and pray.
The strife and toil have brought you peace at last;
Yes, peace—but not forgetfulness of what is past.
I know the heavy burden that you bear
With you must always stay,
But you laid it down at our Saviour's feet,
And its bitterness past away.
And now you would not break the quiet rest
Of him you lov'd so dearly: God knows best.
And so He called him early to his home;
That home of peace so fair,
Where he is waiting till the time shall come
For you to join him there;
In that land where our lost ones are found once more,
Where we meet our beloved, who went before.
But yet you have this comfort to the end—
Not his, but yours, the loss.
God called him home to a heavenly crown,
And He bade you bear the cross;
And the weight of that cross no soul may know,
Save those who through life with its burden go.
You shed below you on the toilsome way,
The path your feet have trod,
A light to point all lesser souls the way,
And bring us nearer God.
In pain and in sorrow, and bitterest loss,
You show how His servant can carry the cross.

CORRESPONDENCE.

AN OBSCURE PASSAGE IN "THE PEARL."

London: Sept. 8, 1890.

The obscurity of l. 690 of "Pearl," discussed by Mr. Bradley in his interesting note in this week's ACADEMY, is, I think, due to the scribe's omission of the words kyng him between con and aquyle. In my edition of the poem, now at press and shortly to be published by Mr. Nutt, I propose to read:

"Of thys ryghtwys sagh salamon playn
How kyndly oure [kyng him] con aquyle;
By wayes ful strenght he con him strayn. . . ."

i.e.,
"Concerning the righteous, Solomon plainly saw how kindly our King (i.e. Christ) welcomed him, &c."

The passage, as Mr. Bradley has for the first time pointed out, is a paraphrase of verses 9, 10, of the tenth chapter of the book of Wisdom. I take the line in question to refer to the words "But wisdom delivered from pain those that attended upon her." To the mediaeval reader "Wisdom" = Christ, i.e., "Oure Kyng," and hence the whole point of the quotation—cf. St. Aug. De Trin. iv. 20:

"Cum pronuntiat in Scriptura aut enarratur aliquid de Sapientia sive dicente ipsa sive cum de illa dicitur, Filius nobis potissimum insinuat."

Kyntly (i.e. kyndly) in the sense of "kindly," is rather early; but another instance occurs in the poem, t for d is merely a scribal mannerism—cp. dubbet (i.e. dubbed), fonte (= fonde), &c. This k-word prepares the way for another to alliterate with it, and I am inclined to think there is a slight play of words in kyntly and kyng. Con is not of much alliterative weight; it is used again as a mere auxiliary in the next line.

The insertion of "him" satisfies, I think, the demands of metre, grammar, and sense. With its second foot trisyllabic, the line is very characteristic of the poet. For the use of aquyle (O.F. accueillir), cp. the only other instance of its occurrence in the poem, where it takes the direct object of the person, and is best Englished by "to welcome":

"But of the lombe I have the aquyld
For a syght thereof thurgh gret favour."

i.e.,

"But by grace of the Lamb I have welcomed thee for a sight thereof through great favour."

The scribal errors of the MS. of "Pearl" consist of omissions of single letters and monosyllabic words, and in no case of the substitution of one word for another. From this point of view Mr. Bradley's ingenious emendation, "How koyntyse onoure con aquyle," is open to objection. Moreover, koyntyse = "wisdom," is somewhat doubtful; and oure = onoure = honour, is anomalous, more especially as the ur of the latter word would most probably have been abbreviated by the earlier scribe—cp. e.g. l. 851, where "honour" is written "hono'." Again, the thought "How wisdom obtained honour" is, I venture to think, not altogether in character with the simple style of the whole passage, or of any part of the poem spoken by the child "Pearl."

I agree with Mr. Bradley that not much can be said in favour of the reading ourē in the sense of "prayer," nor do I think that oure is a mis-spelling of orē, i.e., "mercy"; but it is not, I think, open to the objection that "the final e was not sounded in the dialect of the poem." There are many instances in "Pearl" of the sounding of final e, though in some cases the scribe has omitted to write it. I quote a few illustrative lines from my edition of the text:

"That docz bot thrych my hert[ē] thrang
MS. hert 1. 17
A denely dele in my hert[ē] denned
MS. hert 1. 51
The sunnē bemez bot blo and blynde 1. 83
Betwenē myrthez by merce made 1. 140
I hope no tong[ē] moght endure
MS. tong 1. 225
That haez me broght thys blys[sē] ner
MS. blys 1. 286
Oure yorē fader hit con mysse-yeme 1. 322
To hyrē werkmen to hys vyne. 1. 506
Uus thynk uus oghe to takē more. 1. 551
Wy shalte thou thenne ask[ē] more
MS. ask 1. 563."

Against the last three instances it might be urged that the poet wrote en and not e as the ending of the infinitive; I do not think this a serious objection. Of the other instances there can be no possible doubt whatever. So far as the final e is concerned, I am inclined to hold that the dialect of the poem is artificial, but for the present I must defer any discussion of the point.

I would call attention, by the way, to the frequent use of the monosyllabic foot at the beginning of the line (as in l. 563 quoted above), a point on which Prof. Skeat has been insisting of late in dealing with Chaucerian scansion.

THE "POUND OF FLESH" IN THE "MERCHANT OF VENICE."

Glasgow: Sept. 8, 1890.

In the ACADEMY of August 6, 1887, I cited a Persian form of the Bond-story, the greater part of which was evidently derived—indirectly, doubtless—from the Jātaka (or Buddhist Birth-story) of the unlucky cowherd, of which I gave also an abstract, though the "pound of flesh" is absent from it. From the Persian the story seems to have been taken into the Turkish collection entitled Al-Faraj ba'd al-Shiddah ("Joy after Affliction"), No. 38 of MS. 337 Anc. Fonds, in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris, for some particulars of which I am indebted to the courtesy of M. Fagnan, of the Ecole des Lettres, Algiers. This MS. (there are no fewer than seven different MSS. of the work in that great library) was probably written about the end of the ninth century of the Hijra (say 1485 A.D.), and the collection is entirely different from a Persian book having the same title.

The story of the Muslim, the Jew, and the Judge of Hums (Emessa), as related in the Turkish book, differs in some particulars from the Persian version. Nothing is there said of the Jew's love for the wife of the Muslim. The loan is made before two witnesses in one Turkish text; before 100, an equal number of Jews and Muslims, in another. The money lent is lost through bad luck, and there is no mention of the merchant sending the amount to redeem his bond (and save his "pound of flesh") to his wife. Two Kázis judge the case before the Muslim and Jew have recourse to the Kázi of Emessa. It is the brother—not the two sons—of the man on whom the unlucky merchant fell, fatally for the man, who claims indemnity. After this accident, another Mussulman asks for a drink from a pregnant woman; and the pail he receives from her is so foul that in a rage he throws it at her with such force that she miscarries, and hence the husband's claim for compensation. The other variations are of little consequence. There can be no doubt that this tale was designed to ridicule the absurd decisions of some judges. The people of Emessa are the Gothamites of the Arabs and Persians, who credit them with all sorts of noodle sayings and doings. They have also cousins-german in the folk of Assynt in Sutherlandshire, in the Schildburgers in Germany, and the inhabitants of Tampane in Ceylon. For instance, the man who caused the woman to miscarry is ordered by the Kázi of Emessa to take her home with him and keep her till she is again in an "interesting" condition. This sapient decision of "a second Daniel" is also found in the great Indian story-book, Kathā Sarit Sāgara ("Ocean of the Streams of Story"), where a pregnant woman drives a washerman's ass out of her garden and the brute falls into a ditch and breaks a hoof. The washerman beats the woman and causes her to miscarry; and the judge decrees that the woman's husband (a Brāhman, no less) is to carry the washerman's loads till the donkey's hoof is quite healed, and the washerman is to take the Brāhmani to his own house, and so on. In despair the poor Brāhman goes off and hangs himself. Similar tales are told by the Rabbis of the judges of the infamous city of Sodom, such as when a man cut off the ear of a neighbour's ass he was condemned to keep the beast till its ear was grown again.

It has not yet been ascertained when, and from what source, the "pound of flesh" compact first became current in Persia—the Turkish version, as I have already remarked, is of the fifteenth century; but it was known in England so far back as the thirteenth century, since it is found in the Cursor Mundi to this effect:

A Christian goldsmith in the service of Queen Eline, mother of Constantine, owed a sum of money to a Jew, and if he could not pay it by a certain date, he was to render the weight of the money in his own flesh. When the case is brought into court, the Jew declares that he will put out his debtor's eyes, cut off the hands that he works with, cut out his tongue, cut off his nose, and so on, till he has his covenant. The judge says: "It seems you will not spare him; but content yourself with his flesh—he grants you it—only you must not shed his blood; if he lose a drop of blood the wrong is on you; for though his flesh were bought and sold, he never thought of selling his blood." The Jew saves his goods and his tongue by telling the queen where the rood-tree (the Holy Cross) lies buried.

It is curious that the demoniacal creditor in the Persian, Turkish, old Italian, and other versions is a Jew; but such is not the case in a variant found in a Latin collection of stories, designed for the use of preachers, Harl. MS. 7322, of the fourteenth century:

In Dacia there was a certain man who had two sons, the elder of whom was cruel and mean, while the younger was not only generous but lavish. And when the younger had spent in hospitality all that he possessed, it came to pass that two men sought hospitality from him, and, although he had nothing wherewith he might honestly entertain them, yet, through fear of shame, he took them in. And as he possessed no kind of provision except a cow, he killed it. Bread and drink being still lacking, he went to his brother and requested help of him, but he answered that he would give him nothing at all, unless he would buy it. And as he protested that he had nothing, the elder answered: "Not so; you have your flesh. Sell to me the breadth of my hand of it, wherever I wish to take it from." The thoughtless youth made a bargain with him, witnesses attesting it. The custom of that country was to allow nothing to be bought or sold except in writing, or in the presence of witnesses.

Now when the strangers were gone and the provisions were consumed, the elder brother demanded the fulfilment of the contract. The younger refused and was brought before the king, then led out to the place of punishment, in order that the elder might receive so much of his flesh according to the contract, either from the head or about the heart. And the people had compassion on him on account of his generosity, and told the king's son wherefore and why these things were being done. At once moved to pity, he dressed himself, and mounting a palfrey followed the wretched one who had been thus condemned; and coming to the place of punishment, the people who flocked to the spectacle, when they saw him, gave place. And he, addressing that cruel elder brother, said to him: "What right have you in that person?" He answered: "So says the bond, that for food he would give to me so much of his flesh, and for non-payment he has been condemned by your father the king." The king's son replied: "Will you take nothing else except the flesh?" He answered: "Nothing." Whereupon the prince answered: "But the blood is his own in his own flesh;" and he said to the one who was condemned: "Give me your blood," and at once the bargain was made. Then the king's son said to the elder brother: "Take only where you will your flesh; but if you take with it even the least drop of my blood, you shall die." Whereupon the elder departed quite confused, and the younger was set at liberty by the king.

The oldest known European form of the Bond-story is found in the Latin prose version of the Seven Wise Masters, entitled Dolopathos, of the second half of the twelfth century, written by a monk named John, of Alta Silva, Nancy, where the vindictive creditor is a freed slave whose feet the young debtor had caused to be cut off for some offence, and, as in the Italian version followed by Shakspeare, the clever wife of the unlucky debtor turns the tables on the creditor, by prohibiting him from shedding blood. The story occurs in no other version of the Seven Wise Masters—the French Dolopathos is simply a versified translation—nor in any of the Eastern forms of its prototype, the Book of Sindibad.

PARIS AND TRISTRAN IN THE "INFERNO."

Stanhoe Grange, Norfolk: September 4, 1890.

I have on more than one occasion (see ACADEMY, June 23, 1888, p. 432) adduced passages from various mediæval authors in support of my contention that the Paris mentioned by Dante together with Tristran (in Inf. v. 67) is Paris of Troy, and not the Paris of mediæval romance as is maintained by certain modern commentators. Perhaps I may be allowed to give yet another passage (from a "Complainte" attributed to Oton de Granson, whom Chaucer calls the "flour of hem that make in Fraunce"; see Romania, xix. p. 445) where the classical Paris and the mediæval Tristran are coupled together. A lady is lamenting the absence of her ami, and declares that no lover of fiction ever suffered as she suffers:

"Amis, encor bien dire l'os, Qu'onques Tristan ne Lancelos,
Paris, Genevre, Yseult, n'Elaine,
N'ensuivirent si les esclous
De loyauté, ne le propos,
Comme je faiz, n'a si grief paine."

There can, of course, be no doubt about the identity of Paris here.

THE MSS. OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

London: September 9, 1890.

Prof. Sanday's prompt rejoinder to my last communication came under my notice too late for any reply in the ACADEMY of September 6, and I would gladly desist from further occupation of your columns in the face of his closing sentence.

As a matter of fact, however, our differences are in many respects much more satisfactorily discussed in a correspondence or interchange of remarks than by ex-parte statements in a published volume. For this reason I beg to offer the following:

Prof. Sanday frowns me down in such a manner (not from the usual pedestal of Hortism, however; for I find his statements at variance with those of the master) that it behoves me to see that no misrepresentations are allowed to enter into the case.

In the first place, I did not say that there was no difference between the nature or extent of "mixture" in "uncial or cursive, old or young" MSS. I think I conveyed the impression lucidly to others that "mixture" or eclecticism was present to such an extent in all MSS. (of course, in varying proportions) that it presented a very complicated feature, the extreme outer edge of which had so far only been touched.

Secondly, I boldly challenge the statement that mixture and eclecticism diminish as we descend the steps of the past, and I greatly fear that your otherwise exemplary printers have misread the manuscript of Prof. Sanday's letter; for I can imagine no one qualified to write on the subject at all—not even a tyro—referring to the famous Codex Bezae (D)—leaving B alone altogether—as a manuscript in which eclecticism "diminishes perceptibly." Therefore "D" must be a misprint—for what?

Every writer on the subject, from Beza to Scrivener, has allowed that this MS., with its 13,281 variations from the ordinary text (note well, twice as many as those of B), contains, besides the most extraordinarily mixed text of all forms and origins, a number of otherwise unattested interpolations or peculiarities (nine and a quarter times as many as those of B) which render its history an inexhaustible puzzle to the critic. I had meant to cite a dozen writers on the subject, whose bright language from the dead past might have interested the readers of the ACADEMY; I will only make two quotations, one from the English and one from the American text-book on the subject.

Dr. Scrivener says:

"The internal character of the Codex Bezae is a most difficult and indeed almost inexhaustible theme. No known MS. contains so many bold interpolations. . . . For the present we shall simply say with Davidson, 'Its singularly corrupt text in connexion with its great antiquity is a curious problem which cannot easily be solved.'"

In Schaff's Companion to the Greek Testament, we read:

"It is generally ranked with the great uncials, but is the least valuable and trustworthy of them. Its text is very peculiar and puzzling."

I will only add, for fear I may be thought to have wandered a little from the primary ethics of "mixture," what Dr. Hort himself says—which concerns Codex B and the rest of Dr. Sanday's argument this time more nearly than D.

"Whatever may be the causes, mixture prevails everywhere in the fourth century; almost all its texts, so far as they can be seen through the quotations of the Fathers, are more or less chaotic. The confusion was naturally most extensive in Greek texts; but the versions did not altogether escape it. . . . There is reason to suspect that its greatest activity on a large scale began in the second half of the third century . . . at all events it was in full operation in the fourth century, the time which from various causes exercised the chief influence over the many centuries of comparatively simple transmission that followed."

THE SPELLING IN AMERICAN REPRINTS OF ENGLISH BOOKS.

London: Sept. 6, 1890.

The writer of the careful and generous notice of my American Schools and Colleges, in the ACADEMY of September 6, expresses legitimate surprise at the omission of the u in such words as "honour" and "endeavour," and complains that my English has been "corrupted" by my American visit.

May I remind him and your readers that the book was printed in New York, and that it is an American republication of a report of mine from an English Blue-book? In that report as I wrote it, and as it was printed here, the received English spelling of such words was adopted throughout, as I am too well satisfied with the historical and philological reasons in favour of the present usage to wish to assume the responsibility of departing from it. But American printers and compositors have their own fixed rules; and in accordance with them they have modernised my orthography, in respect not only to the words mentioned by your critic, but also to others of like character.

The matter, so far as my little book is concerned, would be too insignificant to deserve explanation in your pages, were it not for the fact that American reprints of English books are often found to have been similarly treated, and that in these cases English readers should be warned, lest they attribute to the perversity or negligence of the original writers solecisms and innovations, which, after all, have no other origin than the humours (or humors) of an American printing-office.

J. G. FITCH.

[This difficulty—which has occurred before—would be partly obviated if the English publishers of such American reprints were careful to announce the "country of manufacture."—ED. ACADEMY.]

"BATHYBIUS" IN THE "NEWBURY HOUSE MAGAZINE."

Will you allow me, in the interests of fair play, to call attention to an article in the current number of the Newbury House Magazine? Its professed intention is to recommend a new tale, which is said "thoroughly to confute, from a Churchman's point of view, the materialistic agnosticism of Robert Elsmere." To show how easily this may be done, we are told,

"we have only to look at what is called the Bathybian theory. Bathybius had, as he thought, expelled miracle; and he asserted that no educated man could remain a Christian. Haeckel supported him, and so did Huxley, until he had to change his tone after the voyage of the Challenger."

It is too cruel of the writer to palm upon unsuspecting Church people Huxley's "life in the depths" as the name of a sceptical man of science. After this we are not surprised to learn that Mrs. Humphry Ward is "daughter of the late Mr. Matthew Arnold"; and that "as Matthew Arnoldism was the logical development of Rugby Arnoldism, so Robert Elsmere is the natural product of both." But what was the editor about when he allowed such an article to appear by the side of those of Dr. Jessopp, Mrs. Molesworth, and Agnes Giberne? J. B. M.

SCIENCE.

An International Idiom: a Manual of the Oregon Trade Language or "Chinook Jargon." By Horatio Hale. (Whittaker.)

NORTH-WEST AMERICA—the region north of Mexico and west of the Rocky Mountains—is essentially the land of broken Indian tribes, and of the endless languages and dialects to which long isolation has given rise. Every few miles a different tongue is spoken by the aborigines, so that intercourse with any except a small number of these septs would be impossible were the traveller or trader compelled to master a tithe of the modes which the brown men have adopted for the concealment of their sentiments. But in course of time a linguistic medium of communication—a sort of grammarless verbal eclecticism—has grown up which, by general consent, plays the part of a lingua franca all over the immense area between California and Alaska. Like French, it is the "court language." But it is more than this: for without it the whites could not communicate with the Indians, nor the Indians with each other; so that commerce, and that modest approach to amity which is necessary now that the tribes are, in many instances, massed on a reservation, would be difficult. This "international idiom," which has been advocated as superior to Volapük or any of its rivals, is the famous "Chinook Jargon." And jargon it is to an infinitely greater extent than even the Levantine Graeco-Hispano-Turco-Italian, the Eskimo-Danish of Greenland, the Eskimo-English of the western shores of Davis's Strait, the Arabo-Spanish of Tangier, the Anglo-Arabic of Mogador, the Franco-Arabic of Casablanca, the "Sandal wood English" of the Pacific, the Pigeon-English of China and West Africa, and the numerous other incipient languages which the laziness of Europeans, or the demands of commerce, have permitted to grow up wherever what Sir John Mandeville calls "dyverse Schappes of men" came in contact.

It is, in truth, one of the most amazing forms of speech in existence, for there are no inflexions in it, nor any article, and the demonstrative pronoun okok ("this") in most instances supplies the place of the English "the." The genitive of nouns is determined merely by the construction. Thus, kakta nem mika papa? is literally "What name thy father?" Plural is, in general, not distinguished, hyou or "plenty" being employed by way of emphasis. The adjective precedes the noun, and comparison is expressed by a periphrasis, such as wake mika skookum, kakhica nika ("I am stronger than you"); which is literally—"Thou not stronger as I." The superlative is indicated by adverbs—hyas oleman okok canim being “very old [literally ‘old man’] that canoe,” and so forth.

Various absurd explanations of the origin of this jargon have been given. A common one which still occasionally appears in the tourist's volumes so frequent since the Pacific railroads have afforded easy access to the North-West is, that the jargon was “invented by the Hudson's Bay Company.” No Hudson's Bay trader whom I ever heard of was capable of “inventing” a language; and, as a matter of history, the jargon was in partial use long before the pioneers of that company crossed the Rocky Mountains. It originated in Nootka Sound with the early fur traders; but the “international idiom” took shape only after Astor's and the North-West Company's adventurers formed their posts on the Columbia Rivers. There—at Astoria—they found the then powerful Chinook tribe. They naturally picked up in a corrupt fashion numerous words, particularly the numerals, of that language. To these the Englishmen added many of their own, which in the Indians' mouths got curiously altered, and in their new shape were adopted by Whites and Browns alike. The French voyageurs, in like manner, added Canadian-French. The Iroquois, who were in those days numerous in the trains of the peltry traders, contributed a few expressions; while the Sandwich Islanders, who came from the Hudson's Bay Company's post at Honolulu, have left, so far as I can discover, only one word, viz., Oweye, for a Hawaiian. As new posts were established, new words were incorporated from the tribes around the “fort,” so that the jargon grew and is growing. It is, in fact, always in a state of flux, old words falling into desuetude and new ones being added, the new ones being naturally more frequently from the English than from any other tongue, though in every locality there are local ones derived from the languages of the nearest tribes of aborigines. Thus Aht, Chinook—now an almost extinct tongue—English, French, Chehalis, Salish, Nisqually, Klikitat, Yakima, Clallam, Kalaypua, Iroquois, Cree, and Chippeway, beside others (like halo, hyas, kaps-walla, &c.) of doubtful origin, or like tum-wata (a waterfall), chak-chak (an eagle), &c., due to onomatopoeia, appear in Mr. Hales' list. However, besides the local vocabularies from which it is compiled—including his own made nearly fifty years ago—I have two, published respectively in Victoria, Vancouver Island, and Portland Oregon, containing additional words; and I could easily add several expressions in use when I traversed all the vast region where the jargon is spoken, which are not in any printed list.

The jargon is getting more and more important. Sermons, hymns, songs, and prayers are printed in it for the use of the Indians. Whites speaking different languages employ it as a common medium for verbal communication. Suitors plead in it; and not infrequently when a settler takes to himself a daughter of the land—Chinook being the sole language which the parents have in common—their children inherit it as their mother-tongue. Words from it crop up in the vernacular of the frontier farmers, hunters, miners, and backwoodsmen. Thus, in passing a farm-house in an Indian district, I have been asked, “Say, Tyhee, did you nanitsh a cow, as you clattowayed along thar?”—Tyhee being Chinook jargon for chief, master, sir, or “boss,” nanitsh for see, and klattowa for going, travelling. Almost unconsciously it is used in ordinary conversation among people more polished than Western ranchers. I have heard words from it in Parliamentary speeches, and I remember seeing a leading article in a British Columbian newspaper on the depravity of political nepotism headed “Tyheeism.” In Victoria the town-crier used to give a Chinook version of any announcement interesting to the Indians; and in the police-courts it was naturally in much too frequent demand. Bald as it is, for all ordinary purposes it suffices perfectly well. There are about 500 recognised words in this trade language, and we know that in many rural districts of England 400 suffice for the conversational needs of a farm-labourer.

Yet, though the jargon has been productive of much good in facilitating intercourse, it has also proved mischievous in so far that the idler or less intelligent missionaries have, of late years, instead of acquiring the tongue of the people among whom they labour, adopted the more easily learned Chinook, and, with a deplorable trop de zèle, begin to preach and teach in it before they have even mastered the vocabulary thoroughly. I once listened to a missionary—a good man, but deficient in humour—narrating to a group of Indians the weird tale of Christ's betrayal, and Peter's denial of his Master, in a free paraphrase of the Apostolic narrative:

“Peta yaka,” this was the conclusion, “mitlite copa piah, Alkie tenass Klotchman elita tyhee leplet wawa, ‘mika tillikum okok Jesus.’ Peta wawa, hyou silex, ‘nika wake kumtux yaka, mika wake kumtux mesika pilton wawa.’ Alkie moxt elita wawa kahkwa okok, pe Peta wawa hyou dams (hyas mesachie), ‘nika helu kumtux yaka.’ Alkie tenass kellakala wawa kahkwa okok [here the preacher crowed like a cock and clapped his hands to his sides three times] pe Peta mamook lapote pe hyou cly.”

The literal translation of this passage—and the entire address was in much the same style—is:

“Peter he remained at the fire. By and by a little woman, a slave of the chief priest, said, ‘You are the friend of this Jesus.’ Peter said, plenty angry, ‘I do not understand you. I do not know your foolish talk.’ By and by two slaves spoke like this, and Peter speaking plenty dams (very bad), ‘I know nothing about him.’ By and by the little bird spoke like this [crowed], and Peter opened the door, and plenty cried.”

This, it must be admitted, is a poor version of the stately original; though, in excuse, it ought to be remembered that very few people know the jargon thoroughly, and that the words do not sound to those who do quite so absurd as they must in the ears of inexperts. In the above, Yaka, mitlite, kopa, Alkie (the motto of Washington State), elita (ilaite), mika, tillikum, okok, nika, yaka, mesika, moxt, are Chinook words. Tenass

Klootchman, tyhee (taii), wawa, hyou, wake, kumtux, kahkwa, and mamook are Aht, or, Nootka, as Mr. Hales calls it—the language spoken from Cape Flattery to Koskeemo Sound on the western shore of Vancouver Island. Leplete, lapote and pe (puis) are corrupt French; Peta, piah (fire), Jesus, cly (cry), and, it is needless to add, dams are English; while silex and pilton are peculiar jargon words, the origin of which cannot be now traced.

Mr. Hales' vocabulary, which is based on that of the late George Gibbs, is a careful list; and the same may be said of his analysis, though possibly both would have gained in interest had they been edited by someone whose personal acquaintance with the “Oregon Trade Language” dates from a later period than half a century ago.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE ARYANS.

The Shealing, Wimbledon Common :
September 8, 1890.

The Aryan discussion having been re-opened in the ACADEMY, I should be glad to be allowed to state briefly the chief reasons which may be alleged in favour of locating the Aryan cradle-land in the steppes of Southern Russia.

(1) The remarkable correspondences which Schrader has pointed out between the mode and conditions of life indicated by Aryan philology and the mode and conditions of life actually now existing in these Russian steppes.

(2) Such a meeting and intermingling of white races in these steppes from time immemorial—white Alarodians from the south, white Turkomans from the east, and white Finns from the north—as would naturally give rise to the origin of a new variety of the white race—as also probably great changes in the physical environment caused by the draining of the Central Asian Mediterranean now represented by the Caspian and Aral Seas.

(3) The indications in Aryan speech of such hybridity as would correspond with the racial intermixture supposed; and particularly the indications of connexion, if not with the contemporary Finnic groups of language, with—as Prof. de Lacouperie phrases it—the survivals in these languages of a former language.

(4) The fact that, if the undivided Aryans were located in the Volga region, they would, at about equal distances therefrom to the south-west and to the south-east, come into regions—between the Dnieper and Carpathians in the one case, and between the Oxus and Himalayas in the other—where they would be obliged by physical conditions to pass at least partially from the pastoral into the agricultural stage.

(5) The further fact that research with respect to the earlier Oriental civilisations is tending to show that the Aryans in migrating southward from the above defined regions would, both in Europe and in Asia, come into contact with higher civilisations directly or indirectly derived from that of Chaldea—a contact which, in the case of Greece especially, would explain both its civilisation and its mythology as derivative rather than original.

As I propose to undertake a journey, first in Scandinavia and Finland, and then in Southern Russia, with the express purpose of verifying the above hypothesis by the collection of ethnographical, geographical, and sociographical facts, I should be greatly aided if the above brief statement of the grounds of the hypothesis should lead to suggestions with respect to facts specially to be investigated.

J. S. STUART GLENNIE.

Queen's College, Oxford: September 6, 1890.

Canon Taylor is, perhaps naturally, so absorbed by his own theory that he has no eyes for any other. If he will read my review again he will see that I do not assume that "all the brachycephalic people of Western Europe belonged to one race." What I wish to point out is that the Auvergnats are at present the only people in Western Europe who represent, with little change, any one of the brachycephalic races of archaeology; and that we must, therefore, look to them for the only evidence we have as to the complexion of the latter.

Canon Taylor's assumption that the blond Britons of the Roman age were the brachycephalic race of the round barrows I cannot admit for a moment. The only argument I can discover in its favour is that some (not all) of the round barrow people were tall. Height, however, as Canon Taylor well knows, depends to a large extent on marriage, climate, and, above all, food.

Canon Taylor further assumes that the Romans were mistaken in describing the Gauls as like the Germans. Here, again, I cannot follow him. We have no right to identify the Gauls of the Roman age with any of the brachycephalic races, unless we do the same for the Germans. All we know about them physiologically is that they could not be distinguished from the Germans, and upon this fact we have to build our hypothesis.

Other facts are—(1) that the bronze culture did not originate in Western Europe; (2) that it was accompanied by the practice of cremation, pointing to an Asiatic origin; (3) that it was introduced into Britain by the brachycephalic people of the round barrows; and (4) that in North-Western Europe and Northern Africa the blond type, so far as we know it, is distinguished by dolichocephalism, the dark type by brachycephalism. Beyond this we have little else, I am afraid, than theories and assumptions.

In dealing with the subject there are two questions which should be kept carefully apart: where was the first home of the Indo-European parent-speech? and what was the race (or races) which by migration or conquest caused the spread of the Indo-European languages?

SCIENCE NOTES.

At a meeting of the general committee of the British Association, held at Leeds on Monday last, it was decided to accept an invitation from Edinburgh to hold the meeting of the Association for 1892 at that city. Dr. William Huggins, the astronomer and spectroscopist, was elected president of next year's meeting at Cardiff; and Mr. George Griffith, Science Master at Harrow, was appointed to the post of assistant general secretary.

MESSRS. TAYLOR & FRANCIS have published this week a new volume of The Fauna of British India, edited for the Indian Government by Mr. W. T. Blanford. It deals with the Reptiles and Batrachians or Amphibians; that is to say, with crocodiles, tortoises and turtles, lizards, chameleons, snakes, frogs and toads, newts, and caecilians. The total number of species described is 666, as compared with 349 in Dr. A. Günther's Reptiles of British India, issued by the Ray Society twenty-six years ago. Chameleons and newts are each represented by a single species; and crocodiles by only three, including the fish-eating, thin-snouted gharial or gaval of the Ganges. But of snakes there are 264 species, of lizards 225, and of frogs and toads 124—one of which would be a formidable warrior in a batrachomyomachy, for it is ascertained to have swallowed a small squirrel (p. 512). The author of the volume is Mr. George A. Boulenger, who has already classified all known Reptiles (excepting snakes) and Batrachians in the British Museum Catalogues that have appeared during the last eight years. The classification of snakes is new; and all the descriptions of families, genera, and species have been prepared expressly for the present work. On the interesting question of poisonous snakes, Mr. Boulenger writes as follows (p. 233):

"The primary division of Ophidians into poisonous and non-poisonous must be regarded as unscientific; and, although adopted almost generally, it is in so far incorrect that a number of forms usually ranked as harmless are really poisonous, although their bite may be without effect on man and large animals. * * * It is probable that all Snakes with grooved teeth will prove to be poisonous, to a greater or less degree; for it is clear, a priori, that these grooved fangs are not without a function. I have, therefore, abandoned this physiological character in dividing the Snakes into families. Poisonous as well as harmless forms are arranged under Colubridae. All Viperidae are poisonous."

"A general desire is felt by those not well acquainted with Snakes to be able to distinguish at a glance between harmless and poisonous forms. To meet this requirement, various criteria have been proposed by authors, none of which, however, are satisfactory. It is well to state at once that there is no sure method of distinguishing the two kinds by external characters—except, of course, by a knowledge of the various forms. And even then, a cursory examination is not always sufficient, since there is, in some cases, a striking resemblance between Snakes of totally different affinities, by which even specialists may be at first deceived. In short, nothing but an examination of the dentition can afford positive information as to the poisonous or non-poisonous nature of an unknown Snake."

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

THE Government of India, it is reported, has decided to discontinue the annual grant hitherto devoted to search for, and purchase of, rare Sanskrit MSS.; but the decision will not take effect until 1892. A regular staff of native searchers have been employed during the past ten years; and these have visited most of the large temples throughout India, examining and cataloguing the vast collection of works hoarded up there. The private libraries of several native gentlemen have been likewise carefully sifted, and their contents recorded. Of the MSS. thus examined, no fewer than 2,400 have been purchased by the Government, and rendered accessible to the public at Bombay and Calcutta. The most valuable "finds" have included numerous old Jain MSS. Although the search and purchase grants are to cease, the Indian Government has agreed to continue the allowance of Rs. 9000 per annum for the publication of texts and translations of Sanskrit and Persian works.

Two works by the Rev. Dr. Anton Tien, whose services as an oriental interpreter date back to the Crimean War, will be published in the course of next week: a second edition of his Manual of Colloquial Arabic (W. H. Allen), of which the first edition appeared in 1885; and Prayers and Promises for Daily Use throughout the Year (S. P. C. K.), consisting of Scripture selections in English and Arabic.

THE forthcoming part of C. Bezold's Zeitschrift für Assyriologie (Vol. V., Hefte 2 and 3) comprises various matters that may be interesting for a wider circle of readers. It appears that three scholars—Prof. Sayce, Prof. Brünnow, and Dr. Jensen—have independently devoted themselves to studying one of the documents of the celebrated find at Tell-el-Amarna—viz., a letter from King Dusrattn, written in the so-called "language of Mitanni." Although taking up the work from entirely different standpoints, and pursuing it by different paths, it may fairly be said that they coincide in a good many points, and thus prove anew that a sober investigation into an entirely unknown language, hidden by an equally unknown cuneiform script, may at present be considered a task not impracticable. What was called a marvellous undertaking in 1857, when Rawlinson, Hincks, Talbot, and Oppert were independently working out the translation of Tiglath-pileser's Annals for the Royal Asiatic Society, and were laughed at by Alfred von Gutschmid in 1876, is now repeated by the decipherment of the Mitanni language in a manner that will do honour to the three pioneers who have applied themselves to the task. Besides these articles, we may also mention a very interesting one by Dr. Zimvin of Halle, which supplies for the first time full translations of four letters from Tell-el-Amarna, two in the British Museum, which have been published by Mr. E. A. W. Budge, and two others in the Berlin Museum, which has been published by Drs. Winckler and Abst; the astronomical explanation of one of the Cambyses texts, edited by Father Strassmaier, by the indefatigable Epping, who has done so much good work for Biblical and classical astronomy; the publication, by Prof. Lagrange of Freiburg, of a new Nabataean inscription, which was found on a basalt stone in Madabnh, near Jerusalem, one of the ancient cities of Moab; a long note, by Prof. Ward, of New York, and Dr. Price, of Chicago, describing M. Menant's valuable catalogue of the De Clercq collection in Paris. Finally, the bibliography, which fills four pages, shows that Assyriology is growing and consolidating itself for the benefit of Semitic and general philology.

THE last number of the Revue Critique opens with a review, by Prof. Victor Henry, of Mr. Wharton's Etyma Latina. While certain criticisms are expressed on points of detail, the general character of the review may be gathered from the following extracts:—

"Ce petit volume, maniable, solide, d'une netteté typographique irréprochable, est à tous égards le bienvenu. . . . jamais de superflu, mais tout l'essentiel, et une concision de rédaction qui, sans nuire à la clarté, fait tenir en trois lignes la matière d'une longue discussion. . . . L'ambition de M. Wharton est plus haute, et il la justifie; es indogermanistes de tous pays lui sauront gré de lce qu'il leur apprend, leur suggère, ou leur rappelle."

We may add that Etyma Latina, as well as its companion volume Etyma Graeca (both originally published by Rivingtons), may now be obtained from the new firm of Percival & Co.

FINE ART.

Literary Remains of Albrecht Dürer. By William Martin Conway. With Transcripts from the British Museum MSS. and Notes upon them by Lina Eckenstein. (Cambridge: University Press.)

TWENTY years have passed since the appearance of the late Mrs. Charles Heaton's Life of Albrecht Dürer—the first separate Life of the great German artist published in this country, and the first in which the Journal to the Netherlands and other of Dürer's MSS. were translated direct into English from the original German. This book fully deserved its success. It was executed under great disadvantages, and with very little assistance; and the researches of subsequent scholars, though they may have impaired its authority on many points of detail, have added little to Mrs. Heaton's fine clear outline of the man and his work. Nevertheless, these researches, and especially those of the late Prof. Thausing, the publication of revised texts of the Letters and Journal, and the comparatively unexplored riches of the Dürer MSS. in the British Museum, were more than sufficient to justify Mr. Conway in engaging in the serious task of preparing a new English version of the literary remains of Albrecht Dürer. He appears also to have had exceptional opportunities for the purpose, as he had the assistance of the late Prof. Thausing in studying Dürer's art-work and in his translations from Dürer's writings.

In the last chapter of Thausing's Life of Dürer the author speaks of "the rich materials which the master has left behind in his three printed books and in numerous MSS., which still need to be thoroughly examined and appraised."

After lamenting the early death of Albert von Zahn, he adds that

"to attempt to arrive at satisfactory results with regard to the importance of Dürer as a writer and a scholar, it would be necessary to have a critical edition of Dürer's collective scientific writings."

With regard to the importance of these writings in relation to the history of Dürer's art, he expresses the opinion that "the master's art creations are far from being in harmony with his theoretical conclusions and precepts, and still less do they appear to have been influenced by them."

He wisely adds that

"the theory and science of art do not, as a rule, precede its practice, and in Dürer's case they are not so much the motive power as the consequence of his creative energy."

As Mr. Conway may be called a disciple of Thausing, it does not seem unreasonable to suppose that the present volume, with its new translations and fresh transcripts from the Dürer MSS. in the British Museum, may have been partly instigated by a desire to continue the investigations of A. von Zahn, and to add a few bricks, if not a crown, to the edifice of scholarship which Thausing raised to the memory of the great designer. At the same time, it is clearly with Dürer as an artist that Mr. Conway is mainly interested; and he has (at least at present) left to others the preparation of a critical addition of Dürer's collective scientific writings, confining his attention mainly to the Letters, the Journal, and extracts from the MSS. in the British Museum. The result, however, of his labours, so far as they have gone in the investigation of Dürer's scientific writings, fully bears out the opinion of Thausing as to the relation of these writings to Dürer's art. Except for that strong desire to base all his work on scientific principles, and his special effort to arrive at a true standard of proportion for the human figure, Dürer's writings throw no light upon his art. And there is no reason to suppose that even a critical edition of every scrap of Dürer's literary work, or any amount of ingenious commentary thereon, would (to the art-student) add much of value to the short, but admirable, summary of Dürer's posthumous works which is contained in the twenty-fourth and last chapter of Thausing's Life.

Nevertheless, that is no reason why a book which purports to give an account of the great artist should not attempt to deal with his literary and scientific, as well as with his artistic, side. Like Leonardo da Vinci, in this as in many other respects, Dürer was not only a great artist, but a historical character—a typical example of the culture and scientific attainment of the time; and to study not only what he drew, but what he thought and wrote, helps us to appreciate the intellectual conditions under which the best spirits of the time had to develop. It is only by understanding the comparative restrictions of knowledge, and the deterrent forces of ignorance and credulity with which such men were surrounded, that we can truly estimate the force of character and the restless ingenuity of mind by which they were able to work out important truths, and to arrive at a certain perfection within their prescribed limits. It is these limits, no less than the individual force of such men as Dürer, which give character to their work, and stamp it as eternally interesting. Born at another time and in another country, he might have produced work much more beautiful according to our present ideals; but it is doubtful whether he could, under any circumstances, have made so completely his mark upon the world.

Mr. Conway is, therefore, to be commended for desiring to add to his account of Dürer's art and life some studies of the theoretical writings of Dürer, and the Dürer MSS. in the British Museum offered him a field of investigation which had only been partially tilled. For this part of his volume he chose to call in the assistance of Miss Eckenstein; and he makes no secret of the fact that not only were all the transcripts of the British Museum MSS. made by that lady, but that almost everything in his book about the London MSS. which was not known to A. von Zahn is, directly or indirectly, the result of Miss Eckenstein's investigations.

Mr. Conway's more special contributions consist of the narrative of Dürer's life, translations of his Letters and Journals, and descriptions of his pictures and engravings; and these, added to the chapters on Dürer's intellectual and artistic development, give a very complete and comprehensive view of the artist and his work. It appears to have been the aim of Mr. Conway to allow Dürer so far as possible to tell his own story, and to restrict his own comments within the narrowest limits. In some respects, as with regard to the development of his skill in making designs for woodcuts, we wish he had not been so reticent. It is true that the reader may find all he wants in Thausing. But this reason would apply to many other subjects, for as a rule he adopts Thausing's views, steering as clear as he can from matters of controversy, like the first visit to Venice. On the other hand, Mr. Conway does not hesitate to express his own opinions when they do not coincide with those of Thausing. On the subject of Dürer's wife, for instance (that most popular of all Dürer controversies), he takes that middle view which is likely to recommend itself ultimately to all sensible men. Pirkheimer was, no doubt, angry when he wrote his well-known letter to Tscherte; but it is not likely that such a man, even if he had his anger stimulated by the gout, would invent a long and violent libel against the widow of his friend out of mere vexation at losing a pair of antlers. The discovery of the Netherlands Journal has, of course, scattered to the four winds the fabric of malicious invention woven by Sandrart and others on the warp of Pirkheimer's letter; but the letter still remains, and is not the less to be credited because it has formed the foundation for a tissue of falsehood. It is a fact of no little significance in regard to the general relations between Dürer and his wife that, as Mr. Conway points out, in all his frequent references to her in letters and diaries, he never accompanies her name with an affectionate epithet. We know, on the other hand, how affectionate and loyal-hearted a man Albrecht Dürer was, as a son and a friend; and in the absence of all testimony to anything like tender relations between himself and his wife, it is difficult to believe that they existed. Perhaps if we had one of those letters which Dürer wrote to her from Venice it might throw a different light upon the matter; but, as it is, there seems no sufficient reason for rejecting the testimony of Pirkheimer, that she harassed his life towards its close by worrying him to work when he was unfit, in order to make money. Unfortunately such instances are not confined to Nuremberg wives or to the sixteenth century, and tendencies in this direction are not incompatible with the existence of many domestic virtues. Let Agnes Dürer have all credit for devoting a portion of her inheritance to found a scholarship at Wittenberg in accordance with her husband's intentions; but to hold, as Thausing did, that such piety on the part of a widow affords ground for believing that she did not first nag him to death, shows an imperfect acquaintance with human nature.

The time and labour which have been spent in the production of this volume should alone assure it a respectful welcome; and if the net result appears somewhat out of proportion to the study and investigation which have been devoted to it, it is rather because the field has been so carefully worked before than from any want of zeal or care on the part of Mr. Conway and his assistant. A more reasonable ground of complaint against the book is that it is difficult to estimate what this result is, and that Mr. Conway has not given us as much help in this matter as he might have done.

With regard to the British Museum MSS., for instance, the preface informs us that he and Miss Eckenstein have been able to discover a few errors in Zahn's transcripts and to supply a few omissions; but he does not note these errors and omissions. So that nothing but the most careful collation of Mr. Conway's work with that of others will suffice to show how far we are indebted to him. Such reticence is unusual, and from some points of view is praiseworthy. It contrasts favourably with the growing practice of drawing forcible attention in the preface to the most inconsiderable of literary discoveries; but too great modesty in this respect has its inconveniences. In spite, however, of its general modesty, the preface raises expectations which are scarcely fulfilled, for we are told that Miss Eckenstein's study of the Proportion drawings hitherto not reproduced have thrown a flood of light upon the development of Dürer's theory of proportion. We have looked in vain for this flood of light. Perhaps it is reserved for a future publication. It is true that the chapters upon this subject contain some passages previously untranslated, if not unpublished, before, and that they are all interesting; but the most important of them are contained in Thausing's Life, and the rest do nothing to enlarge or complete our view of the subject. Nor is it quite easy to understand from what direction this flood of light is to be looked for, since Mr. Conway expressly tells us that after the "Adam and Eve" of 1504 Dürer's theory of human proportion underwent little change, and the MSS. in the British Museum belong to a later period.

CORRESPONDENCE.

VANDALISM IN PEMBROKESHIRE.

London: September 6, 1890.

Last Tuesday I visited the magnificent Cromlech of Longhouse in the parish of Llanrian, between St. David's and Fishguard, on the western coast of Pembrokeshire. The immense capstone still rests on four upright stones, two others stand in situ, and the remaining one, which has fallen, lies hard by, partly covered with earth.

I found a stalwart labourer, who was armed with a long crow-bar, engaged, by the orders of his master, Mr. Andrew Griffith of the neighbouring farm of Longhouse, in digging up and removing a number of large stones, which may have originally formed a part of a wall of protection, and which were lying buried beneath the side of the Cromlech next the sea. As this operation manifestly tended towards the subsidence of the earth and the consequent overthrow of the monument itself, I remonstrated with the man and got him to fill in the holes whence he had extracted the stones. He thereupon informed me that his master was contemplating the overthrow of the entire Cromlech, in order to make a bank across the field behind.

The farm of Longhouse formed part of the ancient endowment of the Bishopric of St. David's, and has only recently been sold by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to Mr. Griffith. It seems a scandal that they should have concluded the bargain without stipulating for the preservation of so noble a monument of antiquity as the Cromlech in question, which, it may be hoped, may yet be saved from destruction by the timely interposition of General Pitt-Rivers, to whom, as the responsible officer under the Act for the Preservation of Ancient Monuments, I have communicated the facts of the case.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

It has been decided to hold at the New Gallery, from January to April of next year—in continuation of the Stuart and Tudor exhibitions—an exhibition of pictures and objects of interest connected with the House of Hanover, from the accession of George I. to the death of William IV. (A.D. 1714-1837). It is proposed that the exhibition shall include not only portraits of the Royal Family, but also those of the most famous statesmen, lawyers, divines, commanders (naval and military), and the representatives of art, literature, and science. Besides portraits, the exhibition will comprise miniatures, prints, drawings, books, manuscripts (including autographs), embroideries, plate, porcelain, coins and medals, seals, and personal relics. The secretary is Mr. Leonard C. Lindsay.

THE three masterpieces from Longford Castle, by Holbein, Velasquez, and Moroni—which were recently purchased for the National Gallery for the sum of £35,000—are now on view, on temporary screens, in what is styled the Umbrian room.

WE understand that the late Miss Alice Havers (Mrs. Morgan) designed the large illustrations for Mrs. Burnett's Little Saint Elizabeth, published at the end of last year without any artist's name.

THE sixth annual meeting of the Leland Club will be held next week, from Tuesday to Friday. The proceedings will commence with a visit to the Church of St. Bartholomew the Less, which escaped the Great Fire of London, although much altered internally since. Mr. J. G. Waller will deliver some notes on its history, existing brasses, and monuments; and then visits will be paid to the Grocers' Hall, where some remains of Old London, lately brought to light during its re-building, will be examined and commented on, and to the Hall of the Saddlers' Company, famous for its antiquities, Anglo-Saxon foundation, &c. The quaint old town of Maldon, in Essex, will next day be visited; and its interesting churches, Moot Hall or D'Arcy Tower, and remains of Beceleigh Abbey and Leper Hospital Chapel will be described by Mr. George Patrick. On Thursday, the town of Bedford will be journeyed to; and the "Lelanders" will be conducted to its interesting old buildings by Mr. George Hurst, and the Church of Elstow, where John Bunyan was once a bell-ringer, and other places of interest in the neighbourhood will also be visited. On Friday, the old Hall of Eltham and the remains of the celebrated Palace, in the grounds of Mr. Richard Bloxam, will be visited; and the four days' proceedings will be terminated by a drive to Blackheath and Greenwich Park, where the curious tumuli, said to be of Danish origin, will be examined, and a short paper read on them by Mr. George R. Wright, the founder of the club.

PROF. SAYCE contributes to the current number of the Contemporary Review an article entitled "Excavations in Judaea," in which he describes Mr. Flinders Petrie's work last spring at Tel el-Hesi, the site of Lachish. Among the more important results, he specially dwells upon two: (1) the mutability of ancient names in the East; and (2) the necessity of renewed excavation for disclosing the archaeology of the Holy Land—"We have dug up Homer and Herodotus; we shall yet dig up the Bible."

THE latest volume in the "Bibliothèque Internationale de l'Art" is L'Art Espagnol, by M. Lucien Solway, illustrated with seventy-two engravings.

THERE have lately been added to the museum at Trier a number of objects of Frankish date, found in the course of excavations at Ehrang. They include a statue of Woden, and an equestrian statue which originally formed part of a votive column, representing (it has been suggested) the contest between Woden and Jupiter.

THE STAGE.

MRS. KENDAL IN "ALL FOR HER."

MRS. KENDAL, in a new part, is always interesting. Long as she has been before the public, and many as are the rôles she has essayed, it cannot be said that we know the exact limitation of her powers. In the case of many—nay most—players of a certain age we do know that limitation; and their successive efforts, therefore, are deprived of much of their natural attraction. But of Mrs. Kendal, when she is about to undertake a fresh impersonation, we are always inclined to say—almost in the words of one of Bulwer's novel-titles—"What will she do with it?" She is so clever, so able, so individual, as well as so skilful, that even if the rôle be an old one she may be expected to give to it a wholly original interpretation.

I confess, therefore, that when I heard that Mr. and Mrs. Kendal intended to revive Herman Merivale and Palgrave Simpson's "All For Her," and that, while Mr. Kendal would play Hugh Trevor, Mrs. Kendal would undertake Lady Marsden—the woman for whom Trevor sacrifices not only birthright and lands but life—I felt irresistibly impelled to be present at the first performance, although I had to travel from London to Manchester in order to secure the pleasure. What Mr. Kendal would make of Trevor I (remembering his Lord Clancarty) fancied I could tell: the picturesque, the romantic, the humorous, the sentimental sides of the character would appeal to him forcibly, and he would make of the good-hearted reprobate a gallant and engaging figure. On the other hand, Lady Marsden was rather out of the ruck of Mrs. Kendal's repertory; she was not quite like anything that the artist had essayed before. What would Mrs. Kendal do with a rôle not wholly sympathetic (for Lady Marsden loves, not Trevor, but that much more commonplace and rather priggish personage, his half-brother) and by no means of first importance in the piece?

Well, to begin with, Mrs. Kendal looked very charming in her eighteenth-century costumes, designed (like all the rest in the play) with praiseworthy and eye-satisfying exactness by that prince of stage archaeologists, Mr. Lewis Wingfield. I had not seen Mrs. Kendal in powder and patches since she played Lady Teazle. Last Friday (when the revival of "All for Her" took place) her white wig and her modish gowns became her mightily, and (from the stalls) she seemed to have gone back in age to "the twenties," so youthful a widow did she appear. In the first act Lady Marsden has very little to do—there is only the first short meeting with Trevor, and then her presence during the scene in which Trevor surrenders himself to the king's soldiers in place of his half-brother. This, to Mrs. Kendal, was mere child's play. But in the second act she had three opportunities, of which she availed herself with the prompt and full instinct of the artist—the passage of flirtation and cajolery with the Colonel who has been sent to arrest her lover; the scene in which Trevor avows his passion for her, and in which she reveals the interest she feels in him; and lastly, the situation in which, believing that Trevor has betrayed her lover, she overwhelms him with scorn and reproaches. There Mrs. Kendal had material worthy of her handling; and she rose to the height of the occasion, indicating the varying moods of mind and feeling with touches delicate yet forcible.

In the third act, Lady Marsden is more than ever obscured by the more prominent personality of Trevor. She has one fairly effective scene with the hero; but, with Mrs. Kendal in the part, it would have been well if the action could have been so modified as to have brought her upon the stage at the finale.

As it is, the old clap-trap ending, with its "galanty-show" effect à la "Dead Heart"—exhibiting Trevor on the scaffold, on the point of execution—has been discarded in this revival, with much artistic gain, but with some loss of popular impressiveness. It remains to be seen how the change will be accepted by the public—first of all, in the English provinces, afterwards in America, and finally in London, where the piece will eventually be reproduced. Much care has evidently been bestowed upon the play—in which, it will be remembered, the late John Clayton made so marked a success when it was brought out, for the first time, fifteen years ago; and, with the Kendals in the leading characters, it is sure to interest, if only to the point of curiosity, the metropolitan theatre-goer. It is a little old-fashioned, no doubt, both in structure and in diction; but it is theatrically effective, and Mr. and Mrs. Kendal are both seen in it to distinct advantage.

WILLIAM DAVENPORT ADAMS.

STAGE NOTES.

"RAVENSWOOD," as Mr. Herman Merivale's play on the subject of The Bride of Lammermoor is called, is to be produced at the Lyceum on September 20, with Mr. Irving as Edgar, Miss Terry as Lucy, Mr. Terriss as Hayston of Bucklaw, Mr. Macintosh as Caleb Balderstone, Mr. Wenman as Craigengelt, and Mr. Alfred Bishop as Sir William Ashton. If rumour may be trusted, the piece is of unusual literary and dramatic value, and is by far the most important novelty which Mr. Irving has yet given us. It is also understood that Mr. Merivale has deviated from the original story on more than one point, with the result that the first and last of the four acts into which the work is divided will come as a surprise upon the audience.

MUSIC.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

The Art Ballad. Loewe and Schubert, by Albert B. Bach. (Blackwood.) "Without Loewe," says our author, "there would have been a gap in the history of music." It is astonishing how little is known of the works of this composer; and though musicians in this country practically live "without Loewe," very few, if any, are conscious of a gap. Yet Loewe wrote operas, oratorios, concertos, quartets, pianoforte music, and an immense quantity of songs and ballads. Mr. Bach gives a catalogue of his published and unpublished works at the end of his book; and for this students will be thankful, seeing that such a catalogue is to be found in neither Sir G. Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, nor J. D. Brown's Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, nor the Conversations-Lexicon of Hermann Mendel. In the last-named work Loewe is spoken of in very high terms; but the writer in the Grove Dictionary, though acknowledging his poetic feeling and power of musical expression, tells us that his music "has gone by for ever." Mr. Bach intends to speak, sing, and write for this composer until the public "is better acquainted with his sublime works." Loewe appears, then, to have been over- or under-rated, and it would no doubt be interesting to ascertain the exact niche which he deserves to occupy in the temple of fame. For the moment, however, Mr. Bach considers principally his claims as a writer of ballads, and we shall therefore leave the larger question and see what our author has to say on his subject.

He links together the names of the "two heaven-born singers" Schubert and Loewe, the one the creator of the art song, the other the creator of the art ballad. In the first part of his book he discusses the Volkslied, the art song, and the ballad, showing in a clear and interesting manner how each differs from the others. The first is "the simple and artless expression of some homely sentiment or mood"; the second "shows more expanded forms and richer modulations"; while the last is said to be "a musical drama in miniature." By the way, we are told that thirty-nine composers have written settings of the "Erlking," Reichardt being the first; for curiosity's sake Mr. Bach might have given us a list of all the other names. With regard to Reichardt, he informs us that Schubert used Reichardt's tune for his "Sah ein Knab ein Röslein stehen," and that the tune itself came from the people. These are interesting facts. "Schubert's accompaniment is richer than Reichardt's," says Mr. Bach. The one by the first is simplicity itself, and leads us to wonder what the other can possibly be.

A short sketch of the life of Loewe is given, but it was not an eventful one. There are the usual anecdotes of early signs of genius; accounts of his meetings with Weber and Goethe; of his visits to our Queen (to whom the book is dedicated) two and forty years ago; but nothing on which from an artistic point of view we need dwell. This is followed by a sketch of Schubert's life. One might have thought that Sir George Grove, not to speak of other writers, had exhausted this subject. Mr. Bach, however, is able to tell one or two new stories related to him by the composer's most intimate and still living friend—Randhartinger. Mr. Bach says that Vogl is always mentioned as having been the first to sing the "Erlking" in public. Randhartinger informed him that he himself was the first to sing it at the "Stadt-convik" school, the concert-room being filled with students and teachers. Kreisale von Hellborn and Sir G. Grove both refer to that concert, and tell us that first Schubert and then his friend Holzapfel sang it through. It was seventy-one years after the event when Randhartinger related his version to Mr. Bach, and possibly his memory may not be altogether trustworthy.

Loewe was born on November 30, 1796, and wrote his second ballad—the "Erlking"—in 1818; Schubert was born on January 31, 1797, and wrote his "Erlking" in 1815. The dates are of importance, for they show us that these composers commenced their artistic career within a few years of each other. It is interesting to note that both published the "Erlking" as Op. 1, and both wrote it in the key of G minor. Loewe knew Schubert's setting, but said, "It can be done in another way." Our author maintains that Loewe's version is conceived in a more dramatic spirit than that of Schubert's, and quotes Wagner in support of his views. The Bayreuth master is reported to have once said that Loewe's setting was finer than Schubert's. Wagner could afford to indulge the habit of saying bold things, but we fear that not many musicians would accept his dictum.

Our author describes in detail many of Loewe's ballads, and by means of musical illustrations adds to the interest of his remarks. There can be no doubt that the composer was full of dramatic purpose, and that he made striking use of representative themes. In more than one respect he was certainly a forerunner of Wagner. In his autobiography, speaking of one of his songs, he says:

"Neither in the words nor in the music was there any repetition. It did not seem natural to me that a despairing woman who is on the point of throwing herself into the flames should repeat her words."

In thus calling attention to these ballads which are but little known in this country, Mr. Bach deserves the thanks of musicians. He intends to publish some with German and English words, with remarks concerning their expression and rendering. He says, "There are critics who call Loewe's works old-fashioned"; and, while fully acknowledging the composer's great merits, we feel inclined to agree with that statement. Good intentions are all very well; but in our humble opinion Loewe lacked the lyrical charm of Schubert, and he certainly had not the dramatic power of Wagner. If in any way, as our author suggests, Loewe influenced Wagner, it is a fact of great interest; but we fear that Wagner's "giant ballads"—"The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," and the "Ring des Nibelungen" (Mr. Bach might have given these in the right order)—make Loewe's dramatic efforts appear very small. There is, too, in Loewe too great a preponderance of the "Volkslied" element; and the pianoforte accompaniments, for variety, charm, and expression, will not for a moment stand comparison with those of Schubert or Schumann. So far as we are acquainted with Loewe, we accept in a modified form the already quoted statement that his music "has gone by."

While frankly expressing our opinion, which, after all, is only a personal one, we thank Mr. Bach for writing about a composer who certainly is not sufficiently known, and, in consequence, not sufficiently appreciated.

[Next week.]

2 vols., demy 8vo, with about 100 Illustrations, 30s.

SOCIAL LIFE UNDER the REGENCY. By John Ashton.

"The volumes are liberally illustrated. Mr. Ashton does not possess the historian's severe and solemn art. His purpose is rather to picture for us with easy and yet accurate touch the scenes amid which history was enacted and those by whom it was enacted.....The volumes are well worth reading."—Daily News.

"Bright and pleasant reading.....One of the chief merits of the two volumes is that they reproduce in excellent style a large number of contemporary caricatures by Gilray, Rowlandson, Cruikshank, and others."—Times.

Crown 8vo, 5s.

STRANGE CRIMES. By William Westall.

"A subject which will always attract readers.....In it are many stories all well told." Saturday Review.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

PAPER and PARCHMENT. By A. C. Ewald.

NEW HUMOROUS BOOKS.

BRAYHARD: the Strange Adventures of One Ass and Seven Champions. By F. M. ALLEN. Illustrated by Harry Furniss. 6s.

"Genuinely funny."—Star.

"Irresistibly absurd."—St. James's Gazette.

"Brimful of jokes, repartees, and comic situations, which seem to run off the author's pen as naturally as does the ink."—Guardian.

"There is much fun in this queer story."—Illustrated London News.

"Every page is provocative of laughter."—Public Opinion.

"A quaint book of nonsense.....Delightful reading."—Daily Telegraph.

*. The selection of verse in this volume is designed to comfort mourners from the first hours of their bereavement, and is based on those clauses of the Apostles' Creed in which the Church confesses her belief in her Lord's crucifixion, death, and burial; in His resurrection, ascension, and coming again. Poets of the last three centuries have been laid under contribution, but only when their writings fell in with the design of the book.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—Now Ready.

THE NEW REVISED and ENLARGED EDITION

OF THE

HYMNAL COMPANION

TO THE

BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER.

EDITED BY

LORD BISHOP of EXETER.

The Publishers have addressed one copy of the NEW ANNOTATED EDITION, price 2s. 6d., to every Beneficed Clergyman in the United Kingdom; at least FOURTEEN THOUSAND COPIES have thus been GRATUITOUSLY DISPOSED OF; they therefore wish respectfully to announce that in future they can no longer continue to send Gratuitous Copies on application as heretofore, but a Specimen Volume of the Annotated Edition will still be sent to any address on receipt of One Shilling and Sixpence.

The present Edition contains 800 Hymns, of which only 466 appeared in the last Edition—84 Hymns of that Edition which contained 550 having now been omitted, whilst 134 New Hymns have been added; and it is hoped that the loss of those omitted, some of which time has proved were rarely sung, will be far more than compensated by the gain of those introduced.

The new Musical Edition has been edited by CHARLES VINCENT, Mus.D. Oxon, Organist of Christ Church, Hampstead, and by D. J. WOOD, Mus.B. Oxon, Organist of Exeter Cathedral, with the counsel and assistance, throughout their laborious work, of SIR JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus.D., Professor of Music in the University of Oxford.

The "Hymnal Companion" is used in upwards of 5,000 Churches. Grants are made in special cases on the introduction of the "Hymnal Companion" into poor parishes.

A 16 paged Prospectus containing sizes and prices post-free on application.

LITERATURE.

Le Morte Darthur. By Sir Thomas Malory. Faithfully reprinted from the original edition (1485) of William Caxton. Edited by H. Oskar Sommer. Vols. I. and II. (David Nutt.)

It is difficult to exaggerate the services, and the wrongs, done to English literature by German scholars. On the one hand, there is such admirable work as that of Lessing. Nowhere have we a more just and subtle appreciation of Milton and of Shakspeare than in the Laocoon and the Dramaturgie. On the other hand, there is no need to name those German scholars who have wandered from learning into pedantry; and who have found in English literature a field for the display of wild and precarious theories. A bad book of scholarship, by a German scholar, is the most signal case of that saying, "Corruptio optimi pessima"; so that it is with some misgiving that we approach a great and weighty edition of an English classic by a German editor and critic.

But to the confusion of English scholarship, and to the praise of German, we have in Dr. Sommer the very type and example of sound and judicious learning, conscientiously employed in research, and prudently applied in composition. Le Morte Darthur is the earliest classic of English prose, and of English printing; and yet no book has met with such neglect from English scholars, nor been treated with such carelessness as this. It has been reserved for Dr. Sommer to edit a genuine text, to write bibliographical and philological studies, to compile laborious indices. Nor is this all; for we are promised a third volume upon the sources of Malory, by Dr. Sommer, who has secured in Mr. Andrew Lang an accomplished man of letters to deal with Malory as a writer of prose and a master of style.

The first of Dr. Sommer's two published volumes contains a reprint, page for page, and line for line, of Caxton's editio princeps: that rare black-letter folio of which two copies only are known to exist, both of them in private libraries. Between the year 1485, the date of Caxton's book, and the year 1889, the date of Dr. Sommer's, there have been eleven editions of Malory worth remark; and of these not one gives the exact text, neither more nor less, of the original. Familiar as Malory has been to the students, and to the lovers of English literature, innumerable as are the poems derived from his romance, yet it has always been an incomplete or a spurious edition of which writers have availed themselves. Thus, to take two modern instances, Mr. Shorthouse has quoted in Sir Percival a lengthy passage of Malory, which he professes to give in the words of Caxton; but it abounds in Southey's errors of transcription. Again, Mr. Saintsbury, in his Specimens of English Prose, begins his collection with a celebrated passage, which is not to be found in Caxton. This reproach against our literature and scholarship Dr. Sommer has removed for us. Obviously, it is impossible to criticise the accuracy of the transcription and collation of folios inaccessible to the common public; but everything leads us to believe that he has done the work, laborious and exacting as it must have been, with singular fidelity. That in eight hundred and sixty-one pages no mistake should occur is hardly probable; but those which alone the critic can discern, errors of printing, are very few, and wholly insignificant. The text is printed in Roman type, clearly and well, but that is the sole feature in which this edition differs from the original; spelling, divisions into chapter and book, all the peculiar minutiae of Caxton's edition, are preserved and reproduced. The volume is free from notes and from all subsidiary matter, so that we have here a full and perfect copy of Caxton worthily set forth in all the dignity and the simplicity of a classic. Weighty as the volume is, there is nothing cumbersome about it, nothing clumsy; and in this age of cheap and slovenly reprints, all scholarly readers must welcome with gratitude so excellent and choice a book. Clearly, it has been a labour of love to all concerned in its production; and it is published at a price of wonderful moderation.

The second volume, of two hundred and thirty pages, contains eight dissertations, indices, and summaries of investigation. These are, for the most part, written with lucidity and with excellent judgment, and with a condensation and a directness greatly to be commended. The first of the dissertations is upon Sir Thomas Malory, and the various editions of his book; but Dr. Sommer has not been able to throw fresh light upon the personality of our author. He has given two instances in which the name of Malory occurs; and to these we are able to add three more. In the year 1617 a Thomas Mallorie, of Davenham, was elected a scholar of Winchester College; he died a prebendary of Lichfield. In the year 1629, a Phillip Mallorie, of Peover in Cheshire, was also elected. These references are to be found in Mr. Kirby's Register of the Wardens, Fellows, and Scholars of Winchester (1888); and we learn from the Life of Antony à Wood that, in the year 1658, one Henry Mallory, a cutler by trade, was among the Oxford bailiffs. (See the Lives of Leland, Hearne, and Wood, p. 111, vol. 2, 1772). It may yet be possible to connect some of these persons with their great namesake. Dr. Sommer has not discovered in Leland, after an examination of his works, the supposed statement that Malory was a Welshman. Certainly the assertion is not in the Itinerary; if it exist anywhere, it is probably to be found in his Assertio inelytissimi Arturi Regis Britanniae, published in the year 1541, in vindication of Geoffrey of Monmouth, to whom the legend of King Arthur is so greatly indebted. The larger part of the essay is occupied with a minute account, bibliographically complete, of all the editions of Malory, giving the registers, and other details, of each. In the description of the Althorp copy of Caxton's folio, there is a slight difficulty in following Dr. Sommer. He tells us that this copy wants eleven leaves, not, as stated by Messrs. Longman upon examination of the book, ten; and he then gives, as a reason for disputing their accuracy, that they account for nine leaves only. It may be that the obscurity arises from a want of technical skill in the ordinary reader; even so, the obscurity is to be regretted. The subsequent editions, those of Wynkyn de Worde, Copland, East, Stansby, Hazelwood, Walker, Southey, Wright, and Sir Edward Strachey, are fully and admirably discussed. The reader is put in possession of the entire bibliography, and, for the first time, can estimate the value of any edition, and its relations to the original, so far as Caxton may be held to represent it.

The next study of general importance is a collection of notes upon the language of Le Morte Darthur, and it is here that we most cordially thank and congratulate Dr. Sommer. His notes make no pretence to completeness, to a systematic study of Malory's English; but they help the reader to appreciate at once the differences and the resemblances between that English and ours. In one way Dr. Sommer has done to English literature a service, possibly undesigned: he shows plainly that in countless idioms and usages of syntax Malory wrote just such English as the more correct and pure among our modern writers. There are many habits of speech to be found in the writing of "purists," and undeniably correct, which are laughed at by the daily press, but which abound in Malory, in Bacon, in Addison, in Newman, in Arnold. The tradition of fine English may be ignored and vulgarised, but the fine writers are always the same, always more like to each other than to their vulgar contemporaries. A few weeks ago, Mr. Justice Kay was ridiculed in the newspapers for laying down the sound and scholarly rule that the possessive case of "Lewis" is "Lewis'," not "Lewis's"; Dr. Sommer tells us that with Malory "names terminating in s remain unchanged" in such a case. A few more instances may be mentioned where Dr. Sommer treats as archaic usages forms of phrase and syntax common to good modern English. Thus Malory always wrote myn before a vowel; so would, and so does, any living writer who has the courage to write with euphony. Again, "He stands for hymself: 'He weneth no knyght so good as he.'" This is correct, though it is more strictly true to say that the verb is dropped than that the nominative stands for the accusative. Soon after this occurs the only piece of bad English in Dr. Sommer's voluminous work: "That what is rendered by that that." Neither Mallory nor any other Englishman ever wrote "that what," though the modern "that which" is certainly an improvement upon "that that," an ugly, yet not an obsolete, usage. Dr. Sommer also says: "In many cases the relative pronoun is entirely omitted, an infrequent usage in modern English." To name no others, Milton and Browning, learned masters of the English grammar and language, use it upon every page. And is it quite correct to say that "together" or "to gyder," in the following phrases merely stands for "each other"?—"They loved to gyder," "They kyssed to gyder." Surely this is a little prosaic, as is the amusing observation that "the substantive love is treated as a masculine noun." It would be well to amend the rule thus: In Le Morte Darthur, "Love is a god." It is true that "many abstract names only used in modern English in the singular occur in the plural"; but wronges, advyces, ententes, burgels, are not examples of them. And such an expression as "fourty pounde," singular for plural, is common enough all through English literature. Ascham, in his great invocation of "Master Cicero," has "sixteen hundred year, after you were dead and gone." Dr. Sommer adds that the addition of the indefinite article is still more remarkable; but we all know "John Gilpin," and how "He carries weight! he rides a race!

'Tis for a thousand pound!"

Once more, "many verbs are treated as reflexive which are no longer such nowadays"; but to rest, bethink, arme, defende, byhave, are constantly so used in good English. Many more cases occur in which Dr. Sommer has abandoned, as out of use, excellent and sound usages of modern English. Not that he has done amiss in collecting examples of these extant words; they serve to remind us how good English still survives and may be written. But to brand them as archaic is to help forward the debasement of the language. Otherwise, this brief sketch of Malory's language is useful and good.

Dr. Sommer's next performance demands the gratitude and the admiration of all scholars. It is a collation of Wynkyn de Worde with Caxton, giving a complete list of variae lectiones. The labour of this must have been excessive; the result is that in Dr. Sommer's edition of Malory we have practically two editions, one of each text. The list of names and places which follows is also an exhaustive piece of good work done for the first time. After a careful inspection but few errors appear, such as these: Sir Ozana le cure Hardy does not appear upon p. 792 of the text, although the index asserts the contrary. Tintagel, as all know who have walked along the north coast of Cornwall, is not "upon the Bristol Channel," but directly upon the Atlantic Ocean. The most modern form of Ambresbury, or Ambrosebury, is not Almesbury, but Amesbury. Again, it is very possible that the book of Sir Tristram, mentioned by Malory, which Dr. Sommer cannot identify, is really nothing else than the romance of Sir Tristrem, composed in the thirteenth century by Thomas the Rhymor of Ercildoune. In this book, says Tytler in his History of Scotland, "the hero is the very king of hunters; and his profound acquaintance with the mystery of woodcraft is dwelt upon with a fond minuteness." Ellis, or Scott, may be consulted upon the matter. Tytler also discusses, and elucidates, the meaning of the word tryst, about which Dr. Sommer, in his Glossary, is in difficulties. He quotes Ethelred, de Genealogia Regum Anglorum, who tells a story of Malcolm Canmore, in which occurs this passage: "According to that law or custom of the chase, which the vulgar call the Trysta, he allotted certain stations to the different nobles and their dogs."

"The law of Trysta," writes the historian, "was one by which the king's vassals, when he took the pastime of the chase, were bound to attend the royal muster at the ground appointed, with a certain number of hounds: and the phrase yet used in Scotland, to 'keep tryst,' seems to be derived from this ancient practice in woodcraft."

In a note he adds: "Du Cange, voce Trista, who quotes Coke, part 4. Institut., p. 306." Dr. Sommer's Glossary, like his index of names and places, is the first of its kind. If it err at all, it is on the side of superfluity. For example, "Surgeon, sb., surgeon, physician," may be thought a strange piece of information, though to add the old spellings, surgens and surgyens, is proper enough. In his explanation of the word coure, spelled by de Worde cower, Dr. Sommer does not appear to know that the word exists, unaltered in meaning from Malory and in spelling from de Worde, in contemporary English.

I omitted to mention that, upon p. 16 of the second volume, there is a misprint of 1489 for 1498. With very few exceptions, I have set down everything in Dr. Sommer's lengthy volumes which appears in any degree faulty or defective. It will be seen how admirably he has done his work, and how efficiently his printers and publishers have assisted him. To discuss the sources of Malory, or to approach in any way the Arthurian legend, would be premature at the present time, when we are expecting the publication of Dr. Sommer's volume upon the former question, and that of Prof. Rhys upon the second. The excellence of Dr. Sommer's work now before us, and the unrivalled reputation of the Oxford Professor of Celtic, lead us to believe that in the two works we shall have a complete treatment of the mythology, history, and literature of King Arthur and of his legend; so that the Celtic hero will take his place, whether in fact or fiction, as definitely as the Frank Charlemagne and the Scandinavian Sigurd, or the Gothic Siegfried, have taken theirs. But there are certain considerations, possibly worth a little notice, upon the Celtic, or Arthurian, tradition in English literature. It is commonly said that a care for things Celtic, a recognition of the Celtic element in our life and literature, is of recent date; and if by this be meant that past generations knew little about Celtic philology and the like, it is very true; but it is not true to say that past generations were not profoundly attached to the Celts—Cambro-Britons, as they were fond of calling them. In Malory's time there was an immense interest in such things; witness Caxton's account—of the saynt greal and of the moost renommed crysten kynge, Fyrst and chyef of the thre best crysten and worthy, kynng Arthur, which ought moost to be remembered emonge us englysshe men tofore al other crysten kynges."

"Many noble and dyvers gentylmen of this royaume of Englund camen and demaunded of me many and oft tymes, wherfore that I have not do made and emprynte the noble hystorye

Doubtless they knew little about the real Celts; what they relished was the romantic and chivalrous air thrown over those original legends, the courtly, knightly, and Christian charm of the story, as presented by those "two Archdeacons," upon whom Buckle poured such scorn. To Walter of Oxford, and to Geoffrey of Monmouth, is due the popularity in England, as distinct from Welsh tradition and folk-lore, of the familiar stories of Brute the Trojan and so forth. The whole history, with its curious narratives, in which occur Trojans, and Joseph of Arimathea and other discordant persons, was accepted for truth; nor was anyone bold enough to question it till Polydore Virgil did so, to the indignation of everyone. That ingenious but over-fluent writer, Vernon Lee, speaks of "the colourless respectability of the collection made by Sir Thomas Malory." The literary value of Malory is a question which we may leave aside; certainly his work represents an increasing concern for the ancient histories and traditions of Britain. Gradually there seems to have sprung up an appreciation of the "Britons" as the earliest genuine ancestors of the English: an uncritical instinct, true in the main. This most strongly is seen in Drayton; Polyolbion is, for the most part, a long chaunt in praise of Wales. He defends the traditional story, "Our Geffray had his Brute," and he invokes the bard who

"Of famous Arthur told'st, and where he was interred;
In which these wretchless times had long and blindly erred,
And ignorance had brought the world to such a pass,
As now, which scarce believes that Arthur ever was.
But when King Henry sent, th' reported place to view,
He found that man of men: and what thou said'st was true."

Drayton was indignant at the scepticism; and there are some thirty passages in his poems where he breaks out in praise of Wales and of Arthur. He has one reference in his Eclogues which I can only interpret as an allusion to Wynkyn de Worde's edition of Malory. One shepherd exclaims to another called Winkin:

"What, may'st thou be that old Winkin de Word?"

Come, sit we down under this Hawthorne Tree,
The Morrow's Light shall lend us Day enough,
And let us tell of Gawen or Sir Guy,
Of Robin Hood, or of old Clem a Clough.

"Or else some Romant unto us areede,
By former shepheards taught thee in thy youth,
Of noble Lords and Ladies gentle deede,
Or of thy Love, or of thy Lasses truth."

Spenser, as all know, loved the legends of King Arthur, and "moralised his song" by their help. Milton is full of gorgeous passages about them. It was reserved for Sir Richard Blackmore and for Lord Tennyson to attempt what was intended, but not done, by Milton and by Dryden. The loss of Milton's projected epic is irretrievable; he alone could have given us all the grandeur and the beauty of old romance, without renouncing his classical perfection. Dr. Sommer has quoted the passage in Ascham, where that delightful scholar falls foul of Malory for his vicious influence; and I may add Ben Jonson to the number of ill wishers to King Arthur. In his Underwoods he execrates Vulcan for burning his MSS. He could have spared anything, he says, but that. He would have thrown on the fire

“the whole sum
Of Errant Knighthood, with the Dames and Dwarfs;
The charmed Boats, and the enchanted Wharfs,
The Tristrams, Lancelots, Turpins, and the Peers,
All the mad Rolands, and sweet Oliveers;
To Merlin's Marvails, and his Cabal's loss
With the Chimaera of the Rosie Cross.”

Again, an interest in early British legend led Shakspeare to go thither for his Cymbeline and King Lear. In short, what I may call British things, as distinct from Celtic, always kept a fascination for our older men of letters. I might mention the Warton, and especially the younger's poems; and Gray, who here, as in much else, caught the modern spirit, and was a Celtic scholar for that age. In our own time the pre-Raphaelite movement found a singular occasion of success in these Arthurian stories. Malory, writes Mr. William Rossetti, had “a great influence upon Rossetti's mind.” Mr. Pater has told us how wonderfully Mr. Morris touched the old legends; and, besides Mr. Swinburne's Tristram of Lyonesse and the Laureate's unsatisfactory Idylls, there is Arnold's great poem, Tristram and Isolt. In Germany there is Wagner's magnificent drama, Parzifal; in France M. Verlaine, with his sensuous mysticism, has written upon the same theme. Characteristically enough, Mr. Walt Whitman exclaims, “Away with old romance!” because “Arthur is vanished with all his knights.” Arnold's lectures upon Celtic literature contain the finest and most subtle things yet said upon the Celts, unless the beautiful essay of M. Renan be held their equal. And, finally, we have Prof. Rhys to keep before us the facts of science, of philology: not to destroy poetry, but to explain its original in these old myths; to tell us that Merlin is “the Brythonic Zeus,” for example, and not an inexplicable “Ambrosius.” Let me add that it is discreditable to Mark Twain that he should have spoiled his reputation for humour by the foolish scurrilities of his burlesque upon Malory. I have touched upon these illustrations of the influence, and of the popularity, won by the legends, of which Malory, as de Quincey said, is the Herodotus; because to do so emphasises the value of Dr. Sommer's great undertaking. There is no English classic of equal fame and worth so poorly and neglectfully treated hitherto. Now, at last, a scholar not of our nation has given us a final and a nearly faultless edition. For the first time we can read, in its most perfect form, the mediaeval version of that national legend, which ship, its fainting passion, its religious ardours, all at length vanishing in defeat, and being found no more.”

“RULERS OF INDIA.”—Dupleix. By Col. G. B. Malleon. (Oxford: University Press.)

THIS is one of the best of Sir W. Hunter's interesting and valuable series, and far superior to the Akbar by the same writer. In that work Col. Malleon seemed to be working to order, having read up, ad hoc, a subject in which he had not before been conversant; hence, in spite of all his literary experience and skill, his book—to experts at least—proved hardly instructive, or even satisfactory. Here, on the contrary, he writes out of the fulness of familiarity, moving with ease over a field that he had long ago surveyed in every nook and corner. According to the old Greek saying, a big book is a big nuisance; but to do a small book as well as this on Dupleix has been done will be recognised by competent judges as no small achievement. When one looks at the prefatory note, and considers the bulk of material out of which the little volume has been distilled, one can still better appreciate the labour and dexterity involved in the performance.

Col. Malleon begins with an introductory chapter of thirty-four pages, in which he gives a rapid but perspicuous survey of the origin of French settlements in India. The preliminary attempts of Richelieu and Colbert did not come to much; there was not any very great ardour for Eastern commerce—or, indeed, for any maritime trade at all—in the France of the Bourbons. Beyond establishing a sort of preemptive claim on Madagascar, and laying the foundation of valuable little colonies in Bourbon and Mauritius, the French did nothing in the far East before the time of the Regency. The “Perpetual Company” by which the start was made, about 1720, arose out of Law's far-seeing schemes and their partial failure.

The new company was, on the whole, well served; and by 1741 Pondichery had been established and fortified on the Malabar coast; and its governor, Benoit Dumas, had received investiture as a feudatory Prince of the Empire, with sanction for the title passing to his successor. Besides taking this important place in the Oriental hierarchy, M. Dumas had laid deep the foundations of actual power; for it was he who devised the idea—fruitful in after consequences—of raising armies of Eastern soldiers, dressed, drilled, and disciplined on the European model and led by European officers. These two thoughts, the connexion with native states and the employment of “sepoys,” were the factors of European power, paramountcy, and even empire, in India—but not for the inventors. It has been said that a Frenchman invented the dicky, but an Englishman added the shirt; and the homely analogy is not without significance. There is hardly any idea that has afterwards fructified in British hands but has been anticipated by the quick intelligence of our lively neighbours beyond the Channel. But the French are too impatient, too apt to discount results which can only be matured by time and circumstance.

Nevertheless, for a time all prospered. In 1741 Dupleix succeeded Dumas, and Col. Malleon devotes his second chapter to an excellent account of the developments that he produced on his predecessor's lines. Three more chapters show the action of Dupleix against British influence, and for extending French influence in the Carnatic and at the Darbar of the suzerain at Haidarabad. Then we are shown “the zenith of his success.” In 1749 the French Governor had the satisfaction of seeing his protégé Salabat Jang raised to power by the able and faithful deputy by whom he was represented in the Deccan, the Marquis de Bussy. In the beginning of 1751 the French Nizam was duly invested under a patent from the Imperial Chancery at Delhi; and the whole of the South of India seemed amalgamating into a territory of which the French should be the virtual, if not the actual, masters. The British, at Fort St. George and Fort St. David (otherwise known as Madras and Cuddalore) were the only exceptions to the paramount influence of the French.

How all this apparent strength collapsed, in less than four years, is told in the remaining five chapters. Then a final chapter of twenty pages concisely shows the ultimate and complete disaster by which the positions were more than reversed, and the power of the British raised to an appearance and a reality exceeding that of the French at their highest. But it was even then a near thing. In 1782 the armies of Mysore had destroyed two British forces; Coote was dying, and his army—the last troops left to the British in that part of India—was hemmed in and threatened with starvation. Haidar Ali was pressing them on one side, a large body of good French troops menaced them on another. The British squadron was on the other side of India, and the French fleet was supreme in the Bay of Bengal. By the middle of 1783 the news of the treaty of peace between France and Great Britain reached India; hostilities were suspended; Haidar, Bussy, and Coote were all dead; the French in India were the owners of two third-rate towns; the British were administering the Carnatic.

When we try to discover the reasons of all this, we are met by considerable difficulty. The French were well served. Martin, Dumas, Dupleix, La Bourdonnais, Suffrein, Bussy, and Lally were men of talent quite equal to Clive and his compeers, and in some respects the French statesmen had wider aims and more original genius. But perhaps in this very superiority lay the reason of their failure. Col. Malleon well points out (on p. 72) that, “whilst, in the case of the French, the main consideration was the increase of political influence and political power, in that of the English it was extension and expansion of commerce.” In other words, the latter aimed at the immediate and the feasible, while the former looked to contingent and speculative objects.

The French officers were able and zealous, and they did not quarrel among themselves a bit more than their rivals. One British governor of Madras was arrested by his council and kept in prison till he died. Another was suspended by Warren Hastings. On the other hand, Dupleix and Bussy always worked cordially together; and in the very month of his fall Dupleix received from Bussy a letter (quoted on p. 162 of the work under notice) in which the gallant writer renews his testimonies of deference, and offers "respectful and inviolable attachment" to his sinking chief. But the British views were patient, practical, and short; and so they were attained, and became stepping-stones to further attainment. Their French competitors failed because they took their gaze into remote horizons, and planned gorgeous enterprises without making sure that their employers and controllers at home would give sanction and support to those extensive and ambitious schemes. Nor was this due to any great inferiority on the part of the French rulers at Paris. Louis XV., in his youth, was at least as capable a king as our George II., and it has never been suggested that the Duke of Newcastle had more courage or capacity than Cardinal Fleury or the Duc de Choiseul. It was not indeed until the first Pitt obtained the direction of affairs that any great political or military efforts were made by the British in any part of India. But in the meanwhile, Saunders and Clive, and those who acted with them, were moderate men of the middle-class type, content to labour obediently for a commercial company, to do the day's humdrum work, and to leave to the future the encounter with future developments.

The shameful treatment met with by Dupleix after his return to France may seem to be like that of Warren Hastings in England. Both were disgraced and ruined. But, here again, there is a difference, for which British complacency may take credit. Hastings met with a fair trial, and, on his acquittal, received some sort of pecuniary compensation. The great Frenchman was deprived of his money in a spirit of sordid and overbearing fraud.

The Mosaic Sacrifices in Leviticus I.—VIII.
By the Rev. W. M. Rodwell. (Griffith, Farran & Co.)

A MONOGRAPH on the Levitical sacrifices, written by a competent scholar, in full view of the latest researches, might have been an acceptable addition to Biblical literature. It would have been necessary that the writer of such a monograph should take fully into account the claim of the evolutionary doctrine to supremacy in this department of the theological domain. To speak in these days of "the Mosaic sacrifices in Leviticus" savours already perhaps somewhat of anachronism, even though it may not be as yet possible to trace fully the gradual development of the elaborated ritual of the middle books of the Pentateuch from the rude attempts of primitive man to gratify an anthropomorphic deity. Dr. E. B. Tylor speaks somewhat too strongly when he says,

"The copious records of sacrifice in the Old Testament enable us to follow its expansion, from the simple patriarchal forms of a pastoral tribe to the huge and complex system organised to carry on the ancient service in a now populous and settled kingdom" (Primitive Culture, vol. ii., p. 350).

Still, even in Leviticus, there is indication of the original idea of sacrifice as the presentation of food, which, if it was not eaten, was at least supposed to give gratification by its odour or "sweet-smelling savour," and to be, in this less gross and palpable manner, accepted and appropriated. Similar to the gratification by odour was that by sight, when the choice or fleshy parts of the animal were lifted up and presented in the "heave-offering" or "wave-offering." But the greatest interest, especially in respect of Christian typology and dogma, pertains to the blood of the sacrificial victim. Although the author of the Fiftieth Psalm, with his more spiritual aspirations, rejects the idea that Jehovah will "drink the blood of goats," yet, however repellent the idea may be to us, the words of Ezek. xlv. 7, which speak of his "food, the fat and the blood," can scarcely leave a doubt that this idea of the poured out libations of blood had been actually entertained; and it must have been associated in early times with a correspondingly gross conception of Deity. From this point of view it is not difficult to explain, in a manner analogous to that just suggested with regard to the heave-offering and the wave-offering, the sprinkling around of the blood of the slaughtered animal and the smearing with blood the "horns of the altar." It must not, however, be overlooked that even at an early time the offering of blood may have acquired a mystical significance, which, indeed, might the more easily arise on account of the supposed mysterious character of the blood as specially embodying or containing the vital principle. Compare, on this subject, Robertson Smith's Religion of the Semites (p. 359 et al.)

Similarly the chattath or sin-offering evidently had a peculiar mystical character. This is to be discerned in its special holiness and in the sanctity which it communicated; in the burning in a clean place without the camp; in its identification with the offerer's offence, and so in oil and frankincense in connexion with it being forbidden; and however the words of Lev. iv. 31 may be accounted for—whether as pointing to a less flagrant kind of transgression or otherwise—in the general absence of the formula "for a sweet savour to the Lord" in connexion with the burning of the chattath. There is no difficulty in seeing that all this may have furnished one of the roots of the New Testament doctrine of the great expiatory sacrifice, with which Mr. Rodwell's little work is very much concerned.

On the distinction of meaning to be observed between the chattath or sin-offering and the asham or trespass-offering much has been written; but, as Mr. Rodwell observes, "In what especial points the sin-offering differed from the trespass-offering is most difficult to decide." Perhaps the best definition is that which regards the trespass-offering as bringing more prominently into view the idea of restitution or compensation.

The subject generally is one on which it might have been expected that important light would be thrown by the Babylonian monuments. But unfortunately, with regard to the Babylonian sacrifices, our information is as yet exceedingly slight and imperfect, though with respect to the closely related subject of the sense of sin there is clear evidence, as was shown by Prof. Sayce in his "Lectures on Babylonian Literature," and more recently in the Appendix to his "Hibbert Lectures."

In the absence of an ideal treatise on the subject, such as I have alluded to above, Mr. Rodwell's work may be not without some value. It is not quite unlikely that he was attracted to the subject by his ecclesiastical position, which seems to be clearly indicated when, in relation to the "heave-offering," he speaks of "the 'heaving' or presentation to the Father of the heavenly food of the B. Sacrament, even the Body and Blood of His dear Son," and adds,

"It is much to be regretted that this action of 'elevation' or 'heaving,' so scriptural, so ancient, and so full of beauty and significance, should not find an authorised place in the ritual of our incomparable liturgy."

Unfortunately our author's Hebrew scholarship seems, to use a mild expression, somewhat inadequate. Thus, in a note on Lev. iv. 12, we read, "The word hatsia [sic], being the Hiphil form of yatsah, 'to go forth,' simply means, 'he shall cause to go forth,' while on p. 20, with regard to this verb of Mr. Rodwell's imagination, with a final h, we have the explanation "yatsah, 'to cast out.'" And, with respect to the Hebrew word for "offering" in Lev. i. 2, which Mr. Rodwell represents by gorban, we are informed that "it is derived from the Hiphil or causative conjugation of the verb qarab, 'to draw near.'"

It is, perhaps, right to add that, notwithstanding the close similarity of name, the author of this work is not to be identified with the translator of the Koran and the author of various contributions to Biblical literature published now some years ago.

THOMAS TYLER.

A BLASPHEMY CASE IN POLAND IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

Sprawa Zygmunta Unruga. Epizod Historyczny z Czasów Saskich, 1715—1740, przez Alexandra Kraushara. (Cracow: G. Gebthner.)

THE spread of Protestantism in Poland and the means by which it was almost stamped out furnish some melancholy pages in the history of a country already full of strange episodes. The story was told by the late Count Valerian Krasinski in an interesting, but now, we fear, forgotten work published in English, Historical Sketch of the Rise, Progress, and Decline of the Reformation in Poland.

It is a narrative well worth our attention, and has its lesson for other countries. At one time Poland seemed to bid fair to become a land of religious toleration. Thither the Socini fled, and at Rakow, in 1605, their followers issued a famous catechism. Many of the most eminent Poles were Protestants, such as Rej of Naglowice, their first poet;

Bielski, the first historian who had the courage to use the vernacular; and Nicholas Radziwill, at whose expense the great Polish Bible of 1563 was printed. Sigismund Augustus had merely tolerated Protestantism, without having the courage to embrace it publicly. Calvin, however, dedicated one of his treatises to him. Stephen Bathory was a rigid Catholic; but the real persecution began under Sigismund III., who had no small portion of the fanatical spirit of Philip II. of Spain. Soon after the Jesuits came into Poland there was a complete change. The whole education of the country fell into their hands. The elementary schools, chiefly belonging to the Protestants, are said to have amounted in the sixteenth century to 1500. They disappeared without leaving a trace. The Socinian school at Rakow was closed in 1638 by order of the Diet, and finally all Socinians were expelled the country in 1658. Both the members of the Greek orthodox church and the Dissidents, as the Protestants were called, had a grievous time. One of the most efficient of the Jesuits was the celebrated Peter Skarga, whose sermons are considered the finest specimens of Polish pulpit-eloquence; but he had a pernicious influence upon his country. Still, Protestantism lingered on in spite of persecution. Even in the Saxon period we now and then find some unfortunate victim from their number brought before the tribunals. In the reign of John Sobieski we get the terrible case of Christopher Lyszczyński—a Lithuanian landed proprietor, who having carelessly written down some freethinking notes, was denounced before the Diet at Wilno, and sentenced to have his tongue cut out and to be afterwards decapitated and his body burnt. This atrocious sentence, in spite of the recantation of the offender, was duly carried out. Sobieski was horror-struck at the occurrence, which he had not the power to prevent, and declared that the Inquisition could do nothing worse. But Bishop Żaluski, the author of the Epistolæ Historico-familiares, has expressed his delight at the punishment.

It is with a very similar case, although not terminating in such a revolting manner, that M. Kraushar deals in the interesting volume now before us. In the year 1715 Sigismund Unruh (or, as the name is written in Polish, Unrug) a Protestant noble, Starosta of Obornik and chamberlain of the king, Augustus, was accused of blasphemy. The family, as the name shows, was of German origin, and is said to have come from Alsace; but as early as the twelfth century some of the members of it are met with in Bohemia. The Polish line was founded by a certain Christopher von Unruh, who settled in Great Poland in the sixteenth century. Sigismund, the hero of our story, was born at Miedzychod in 1676. He was a man of considerable intelligence, who had received his education at a German university, and was in the habit of keeping a commonplace book—Collectanea, or Silva Rerum, as such books seem to have been called at that time—containing his notes on foreign travel, extracts from classical and modern authors, and other miscellaneous items. This book he used to carry about on his expeditions; and on one occasion, while staying at the house of a lady at Sroda, it was seen by a Catholic priest, and also by a certain Andrew Potocki, the town clerk of Gniesen, a personal enemy of Unruh's, as they had espoused different sides in the great struggle between Augustus and Stanislaus Leszczyński for the Polish throne. Potocki enjoyed a bad name for malice and avarice. He found in Unruh's commonplace book the following sentence, in the French language:

“La Verité salutaire n'est elle donc descendue du Ciel que pour être aux habitans de notre globe une occasion perpetuelle d'erreur, de guerre, de haine et de division?”

This trivial passage, out of which it appears difficult to extract a dangerous meaning, is to be found in a collection of essays, entitled L'esprit des Cours d'Europe, which originally were published twice a week at the Hague between the years 1699—1710, and were edited by a certain Nicholas Guede-ville. The identical passage is in the volume for Sept.-Dec., 1709. Potocki denounced Unruh before the local court of Piotrkow; and that tribunal condemned him to suffer the same punishment as Lyszczyński, and to have his blasphemous paper burnt with him. Moreover, all his goods were to be forfeited, and part to go to the accuser. The sentence is given by M. Kraushar at length on p. 27 in the corrupt Latin then in use. But Unruh escaped into Germany; and in his absence his commonplace book was publicly burnt at Piotrkow—not by the executioner, who appears to have been busy elsewhere, but by the executioner's wife, as is duly described in a rare little German tract, which has been laid under contribution by M. Kraushar, who has spared no research in order to throw light upon this strange case of perverted justice. In some of the pièces justificatives he has been assisted by M. Estreicher-Rosbierski, the author of the invaluable Bibliografia Polska and custodian of the Jagiellon library at Cracow. Unruh was obliged to remain in exile till 1726, when the Diet of Grodno remitted his sentence and restored his property. The matter had in the meanwhile been referred to the Pope, who declared the sentence null and void on account of the incompetence of the tribunal by which it was given. The decree had also been referred to the Sorbonne, who likewise considered that it was not binding. This was done through the agency of M. Rottenbourg, the French ambassador at the Prussian Court. It is evident, therefore, that the case had made a good deal of noise throughout Europe. The King, Augustus II., could not help Unruh, as he had found in the Jesuits the chief supporters of his throne, and was afraid to offend them. The influence of the Sorbonne is well known, especially in the censorship of books. M. Kraushar has collected many instances in which this college exercised such functions. In 1732 Sigismund Unruh died, his enemy, Potocki, having preceded him to the grave.

It is a striking story of ignorance and intolerance, and gives us a sad picture of Poland at that time, coming as it does between the fate of Lyszczyński and the executions at Thorn in 1724, when, on a trumped-up charge of having fomented a riot, which caused the destruction of some Jesuit churches, Rösner, the burgomaster of the town, and several other leading Protestants were executed. M. Kraushar has illustrated his narrative with much curious matter descriptive of the times. The clergy, so careful of doctrine, seem to have troubled themselves but little about the moral condition of their flocks. But these transactions were not unobserved by the Protestant powers of Europe. In 1731 Woodward, the English minister at the Polish court, presented a memorial to the king, enumerating the oppressions to which the Protestants were exposed. The cruelties at Thorn had sent a thrill of horror throughout Europe; and representations of a similar tenour were made by Prussia, Denmark, Sweden, and Holland. The first of these powers already cast longing eyes upon Danzig. During the reign of the contemptible Augustus III. the Dissidents suffered greatly, as we may gather from the petition presented to Stanislaus Poniatowski at the Diet of 1766.

“Our churches,” they say, “have been partly taken from us under different pretences, and partly are falling into ruins, as the repairing of them is prohibited. . . . Our youth is obliged to grow up in ignorance and without the knowledge of God. The burying of our dead, even at night time, is exposed to great danger; and we are obliged, in order to baptise children, to convey them out of the country.”

In the Diet of 1767 there were some ameliorations of their condition, but more apparent than real. Among other things, although it was promised that the Dissidents should be admitted to equal rights with the Roman Catholics, yet the latter enjoyed extraordinary privileges. The monarch was absolutely required to conform; and the proposal of the election of a candidate of any other faith to the throne was declared to be high treason, punishable with death. Conversion from the Roman Catholic religion entailed exile. But the end of the country was at hand.

M. Kraushar has prepared his monograph with great care. At the end of each volume he gives his documents. They are quaint in their curious Latinity, as are the Polish papers elsewhere introduced in what is called the Macaronic style—Latin sentences interspersed with the vernacular, as we may also see in some German documents about the same period.

The book presents a curious picture of old Poland—intolerant, aristocratic, superstitious. It is to be hoped that M. Kraushar will continue his series of historical monographs. An interesting one on Stephen Bathory and his dealings with Doctors Dee and Kelly has already been reviewed in the ACADEMY. He will perhaps collect them afterwards, as Szajnocha did, whose “Historical Sketches” furnish some of the most readable and instructive volumes in the literature of any country.

W. R. MORFILL.

The Loves and Marriages of some Eminent Persons. By T. F. Thiselton-Dyer. In 2 vols. (Ward & Downey.)

THE critic who remembers certain pleasant contributions to the popular literature of folk-lore made by Mr. Thiselton-Dyer will feel a desire to speak kindly of any work from his pen; but the critic's duty is first to be just, and it is simply impossible to combine justice and kindness in speaking of these two bulky volumes. The simple fact is, they are about as bad and worthless a specimen as we have ever seen of the cheapest and commonest kind of book-making. The book-maker, as book-maker, is not a person to be regarded with the contempt sometimes indiscriminately poured upon him by superfine reviewers. Compilation may be made not only a useful but a fine art—witness various charming volumes by Mr. W. Davenport Adams and other conscientious literary labourers who deserve honourable mention; but fine art demands brain work as well as scissors and paste, and in these pages we find not the faintest indications of any guiding intelligence other than that very elementary faculty required to group the cuttings under their various headings of classification, "Married Happiness," "Marriage Romance," "Early Loves," and so on. Even this arrangement, primitive as it is, is thoroughly clumsy; for there is hardly a single section which does not overlap, or is not overlapped by, some other section. There is, for example, no reason in the world why nearly all the facts related in the chapter entitled "Separation" should not have been included in the preceding chapter "Unhappily Married"; and it is impossible either to make an intelligible differentiation between the contents of the first two chapters in the second volume, "Early Loves" and "Early Courtship and Marriage," or to assign a sufficient justification for the separate existence of either, the contents of both being duly covered by some other heading.

Mr. Thiselton-Dyer's plan seems to have been to work his way steadily through Mr. Leslie Stephen's Dictionary of National Biography and a number of standard memoirs, and to extract from them with naïf indiscriminateness as many items of matrimonial or amatory information as would fill some 600 pages, without any reference to the intrinsic interest of the material selected. It is undoubtedly a fact that "eminent persons," like persons who are not eminent, do as a rule fall in love several times, and marry at least once; but the mere fact of a man's eminence does not necessarily confer upon his experiences of courtship and marriage any special interest for the general public. Of course they are interesting in their proper place, which is the eminent man's biography; but, when thus arbitrarily dragged from their true environment, to be exhibited in a kind of matrimonial museum, they lose all their attractiveness. The arrangement of each room in the museum is equal in badness to the arrangement of the whole, for the various "objects" follow each other in alphabetical order, the most ridiculous juxtaposition being the inevitable result. Thus we are treated to snippets of information concerning the married happiness of Dr. Arnold, Lord Beaconsfield, Thomas Bewick, John Bright, and Charlotte Brontë; and we are led on, by way of William Godwin, Edward Miall, and Lord Shaftesbury, to Professor Wilson and Bishop Wordsworth, who close the case. The heroes of "Marriage Romance" and the eminent persons who indulged in "Early Flirtations" follow each other in the same manner, and the incongruous jumble thus achieved is something quite unique.

The slovenliness of the literary style in the passages by which Mr. Thiselton-Dyer binds his cuttings together matches the slovenliness of the general structure. Words are loosely and inappropriately used, sentences are constructed with an awkwardness which would disgrace a literary beginner; while the vulgarism "and who," unaccompanied by a preceding relative, appears with irritating frequency. Nor can it be said that the substance is any great improvement upon the form. Much of the matter with which the book is padded out to quite needlessly large proportions is altogether irrelevant to its nominal theme, and of what is relevant a great deal is gratuitously disagreeable. It would be difficult to count the number of pages devoted to the disinterment of scandals which are half or wholly forgotten; and, unfortunately, Mr. Thiselton-Dyer's offences against good taste are not confined to his collections of unsavoury gossip. There is no excuse for dragging in the reference to the terrible affliction which cast a dark shadow over the life of Thackeray; and the compiler insults the memory of a distinguished man and a devoted woman by classing among "marriages by consent"—his euphemism for illicit unions—the long, tender, and, as we have every reason to believe, perfectly reproachless friendship of Charles Reade and Mrs. Seymour.

It is not pleasant to have to speak thus of Mr. Thiselton-Dyer's book; but such publications as this are the bane of literature, and deserve only ruthless extermination. They do not instruct, and such entertainment as they provide is of the vilest kind. We know this sounds severe, and we should be glad to modify the severity by some words of praise; but for such words the book unfortunately supplies no suggestions, since when its substance is neither irrelevant nor disagreeable, it is utterly trivial.

NEW NOVELS.

The Riddle of Lawrence Haviland. By Constance Smith. In 3 vols. (Bentley.)

The Better Man. By Arthur Paterson. (Ward & Downey.)

Ko Méri. By Jessie Watson. (Eden, Remington & Co.)

Between the Ferries. By Margaret Moyes Black. (Edinburgh: Oliphant, Anderson, & Ferrier.)

The Mesmerist. By E. H. C. Oliphant. (Eden, Remington & Co.)

The Rajah and the Rosebud. By William Sime. (Bristol: Arrowsmith.)

The Sloane Square Scandal. By Annie Thomas. (Sonnenschein.)

The Riddle of Lawrence Haviland is not so called because of any puzzle of plot or mystery in the working out of the story. Riddles of that sort are common enough, and few of them are worth solving. But here is a fine conception of character, which grows upon the reader from the first outlines of it until he finds that he has made the acquaintance of an extraordinary man. Lawrence Haviland unconsciously lives up to an impossible ideal—that of inflexible justice. He is described by his friends as a man to whom it is perfectly natural to think what is honourable and do what is right. Such a man might well be a prig, but Lawrence Haviland is nothing of the kind. He is simply a gentleman, fashioned after a true pattern of that article, but with his best instincts so largely developed that it will be odd if they do not play him false. When we meet with him first, he is a tutor at Cambridge, and in that capacity he has to decide the fate of an undergraduate who is suspected of misconduct. He does not know it, but on his decision hang some of the destinies of his own life. A young lady appears on the scene, the sister of another undergraduate, and she puts in a note for charity of judgment. She, too, mingles with the tutor's destinies. He decides; and the advancing plot unfolds the riddle of an austere exact life, caught in the toils of its unsuspecting self-righteousness. In such a story there is necessarily a good deal of external interest, but the intelligent reader will find himself absorbed in the masterly handling of character which goes on from the beginning. Haviland is an almost unique study—not quite a pleasant one; and the reader will sometimes be inclined to dispute with the writer whether he ought to have done and said such and such things. But this disputatious interest in a personage of fiction is one of the best testimonies to the value of a novelist's work. Hilda, Haviland's wife, is as interesting as himself. The "little pitted speck" in her which, for a time, so strangely alienated him from her was just that touch of everyday humanity which was his own worst want. Though these chief personages of the story stand out, as they ought to do, in conspicuous relief, the same skill and care have been bestowed upon the subordinate characters. They are all people to be known and remembered. Eliot, the fussy, well-intentioned ex-cabinet minister; Meyrick, the cultivated and prosy valetudinarian; Ladoga, the handsome desperado, who plays so vital a part in the story; Kathleen, with her girlish beauty and fatal waywardness—they are all drawn to the life and fitted to their place. Miss Constance Smith has, in fact, produced an exceptionally able novel; one which not only fulfils all the promise of her former book, but raises the highest expectations in regard to her future work in fiction.

A healthy, stimulating atmosphere, a great variety of character, and a story full of good points and excellent purpose, are merits fairly to be ascribed to The Better Man. Mr. Arthur Paterson describes ranch life, and its effect upon those who live it, with a good deal of vividness. The wide range of country, the almost entire loneliness, and the monotony of sheep-farming under such conditions, make the most buoyant nature taciturn. But an independence of character is produced at the same time, which more ordinary conditions might not have brought out. This independence is seen to advantage in Frank Houghton, who makes a capital hero. One naturally looks for somebody in the part of villain in a story of New Mexico; and here he is, in the person of Marx Galt, whom the reader will loathe as a rascal while admitting the artistic finish of the type. Galt practises on Tom Eckersley, Frank's ne'er-do-well friend; and it is his connexion with Tom which causes Col. Eckersley to go out with his wife and daughter to New Mexico—an event from which exciting incidents follow. They are told with thrilling effect, and a freshness of style which of itself is one of the most welcome features of the story.

From New Mexico to New Zealand is a bigger leap than it seems. The author of Ko Méri has an abundance of good material, but she insists on bringing into her story too many of the small incidents of everyday life. Her people are interesting, because they are natural; but it becomes rather a tax upon the reader when he is required to be present at every meal they eat. Mary Balmain, the half-caste, is a fascinating heroine. Her grace, beauty, and general attractiveness impress the reader as much as they did those around her. If the book has an object beyond that of telling the story of Mary Balmain's life, it is to show some of the alleged failures of civilisation. The writer ventures to suggest that Bishop Selwyn's work in New Zealand scarcely reached the Maoris. She supposes that a few boys may have been benefited; but she says that the once "brave and honourable" natives, since our interference with them, have become "idle, sullen, and full of absurd superstitions."

"It passes me to understand," says Mary Balmain, "why missionaries and such large sums of money are sent to redeem strangers, that whatever they may be are not hungry and cold, when hundreds of thousands in Europe and many in England itself are ignorant, wicked, and starving."

Mrs. Black evidently loves the scenes she describes in Between the Ferries. She knows her people well, and is keen in perceiving their individualities. Though it is not a very wide world between the ferries, it is big enough to be a mirror of human life. The crabbedness of a miserable old age; the selfish manoeuvring of a fortune-seeking widow; the faithfulness of old servants; and the sorrows of a young neglected child, who yet retains a warm heart and a cool judgment amidst peculiar trials—all these have a place in the story. The style is fresh and almost balmy. It breathes, indeed, the very air of the ferries.

A very different air—as the title of the book suggests—pervades The Mesmerist. A story of a murder done under hypnotic influence, with all the familiar mystery, misunderstanding, and fraud which are incident to that kind of crime, may still have interest for many readers, but the thing has been much overdone. In the present book it is overdone in the sense that the necessary sensationalism is wrought up to an extreme pitch; but that, in its way, is perhaps a merit.

In The Rajah and the Rosebud we make acquaintance again with the Bluebeard of nursery romance. But he is now a highly refined Bluebeard, who talks many languages, and has lived in England. He would never have thought of killing his wives if he had not fallen in love with Rosebud, and it is just possible that that young lady might have made a Christian gentleman of him if she had married him. How she managed to escape doing so the reader must be left to find out.

Miss Annie Thomas's book is a collection of short stories, "The Sloane Square Scandal" being one of the best, though there is a certain smartness about all of them.

GEORGE COTTERELL.

CURRENT LITERATURE.

"ADVENTURE SERIES." — Memoirs of the Extraordinary Military Career of John Shipp. With an Introduction by H. Manners Chichester. Illustrated. (Fisher Unwin.) Though far inferior in literary merit to Trelawny's Adventures of a Younger Son, and inferior also in historical importance to Robert Drury's Journal in Madagascar, this third volume of the "Adventure Series" deserves no less success than its predecessors. One advantage it has over both, in being a genuine autobiography. For though Shipp doubtless received assistance from some friend better skilled than himself in composition, it is equally certain that he was not a man to put his name to a single untruth, or even to an exaggeration of his own achievements. The book bears upon its face the stamp of veracity, embellished only by the sentimentalism of the age, in both thought and expression. And what a record it is! Brought up in a village workhouse, then apprenticed to a brutal East Anglian farmer of the type made known by Dr. Jessopp, our hero enlisted at the age of about twelve in a regiment that seems to have been mainly recruited from pauper boys. The greater part of his service was passed in India, where he took part in that campaign of Lord Lake in Hindustan which has never received the attention it merits, and afterwards in the Gurkha and Pindari Wars of Lord Hastings. Whenever hard fighting was to be done, Shipp came to the front. During Lake's disastrous siege of Bhartpur he led the forlorn hope of the storming party on no less than three occasions, and was each time severely wounded. Twice he was promoted from the ranks for valour—there was no Victoria Cross in those days, nor did he ever obtain a medal. But in time of peace Shipp was less fortunate. His first commission he had to sell, in order to pay his debts; his second commission he lost by the sentence of a court-martial, the justice of which he does not dispute. On his return to England, he found employment in the newly-organised police-force, and finally as the master of the Liverpool Workhouse. The value of his Memoirs consists in its lifelike picture of campaigning in India, from the point of view of a simple soldier, at the beginning of this century. For a more general description of Anglo-Indian society at about the same time the curious may be referred to Capt. Bellew's Memoirs of a Griffin, reprinted (with the original illustrations) by Messrs. W. H. Allen in 1880. The present editor has done his work well, having (inter alia) searched the baptismal register of Saxmundham, in order to verify Shipp's age; but he might have given more abundant explanations of Indian terms. The publishers are also to be thanked for the contemporary illustrations. Incidentally, we may mention that Shipp calls a Dutch farmer at the Cape "the old boss." We do not know whether this is to be regarded as evidence for the Dutch origin of the word, or only as a relic of East Anglian slang. No such early usage is recorded in Dr. Murray's Dictionary.

Frays and Forays: Sketches in Peace and War. By Capt. G. J. Younghusband. (Percival.) Military literature can show no more striking contrast than from the "ranker" of Lake's fighting army to the smart wing officer of the Queen's Own Corps of Guides. Not that the latter is not required to carry his life daily in his hand almost as much as the former; but the entire surroundings of the two are so different! And, in its own small way, this little volume of sketches by Capt. Younghusband is as well worth reading as the elaborate Memoirs of John Shipp. Mr. Rudyard Kipling, the literary lion of the last London season, has touched with consummate cleverness upon some of the aspects of life upon the Afghan frontier; and Prof. James Darmesteter has recently brought back from the same region the materials for a philological monograph. But there is yet room for a plain narrative of the manner in which English officers have tamed the wild border tribes, by the same methods which pacified the Scotch Highlands. If Capt. Younghusband has not himself written such a narrative, he has at least contributed some chapters towards it. If only he would devote one of the furloughs of which he talks to serious literary labour, we believe that he could produce something that would deserve to live.

Sporting Sketches. By Diane Chasseresse. (Macmillan.) Notwithstanding its unpretending title, not a little pleasant writing and many a delightful incident in Scottish sport will be found in this little book. It is dedicated by a mother to her children, and the latter are to be deemed happy in possessing so adventurous and sensible a mother to indoctrinate them into the charms of wild nature and sport. She herself must have been a trying child to nurses and maids. Getting wet through daily as high as her waist was the least of her misdemeanours when trying to capture a trout or shoot a rabbit. She appears to have been trusted with a light rifle and allowed to wander over the heather at very tender years, so that she early became an excellent shot. Indeed, as her family had settled in a lodge fifty miles from a butcher, she was not seldom encouraged to go out and shoot for the larder. This custom, falling in with her eager love of the hills and of wild creatures, has enabled the author to write a book in such easy flowing style that it will equally delight the grown-up sportsman or the child, who will most certainly be led to imitate the adventures herein contained. The story of the raw sportsman who shot a mallard and was then told by the keeper, "I'm thinking it's just one of McGregor's tame ducks that's got away down the river"; or of the first salmon which the authoress caught when a little girl and brought home in her arms, is charming. Amusing, too, is it to read how the first omelette she cooked on the heather was flavoured with bits of green leaves picked around at random, because all omelettes ought to contain green specks. We sympathise with her when first trusted with a heavy double-barrelled rifle; she closed her eyes and pulled both the triggers at once, and after a terrific report found her shoulder black and blue. The drollery of her camping out is inimitable, while the pranks of a pet otter in a London house will touch all who are fond of pets. This is by far the most amusing book of sport which has been produced this year, and the authoress vouches that every fact in it is true. This, however, is patent to all who know aught of Scotch sport. Diane Chasseresse has made herself an admirable deer-stalker, but must be a martyr to rheumatism. Many of her recitals, as for instance, that of shooting a seal, shooting a stag on its way to the next forest, and the like, are models of descriptive writing. The illustrations, if somewhat blurred, are generally as telling as the narratives they are meant to embellish.

Holiday Studies of Wordsworth, by Rivers, Woods, and Alps. By the Rev. F. A. Malleon. (Cassell.) There is probably no poet, unless it be Scott, with whom a holiday, or a succession of holidays, can be so pleasantly spent as with Wordsworth. As having a parish not far from the lake country, Mr. Malleon has been able to take such holidays freely. He appears to know the scenery of the Duddon as familiarly as the students of Wordsworth know the sonnets in which the glories of that stream are celebrated. Both as a commentary on some of the sonnets, and as an independent account of the actual and legendary life of the district, Mr. Malleon's descriptions are most welcome. Wordsworth has left a keener impression of his work on the surroundings of the Duddon than on Bolton Woods. It is the history associated with Bolton Abbey, rather than the romance of "The White Doe of Rylstone," which makes this region memorable. Mr. Malleon, however, recalls whatever charm is traceable to the poem and the poet. Wordsworth's "Westmoreland Girl" lived, with her husband, in Mr. Malleon's parish, and died there. He tells the story of her illness and death with a good deal of pathos. The poet's prognostication, that could never have been realised; for Sarah Macereth grew up a delicate woman, and died of consumption at the age of thirty-seven.

"Should the country need a heroine She might prove our Joan of Arc,"

THE life of the female population of Turkey is a good subject for special study, which, owing to the seclusion of women in that country, only a lady can investigate. In The Women of Turkey and their Folk-lore (David Nutt), Miss Garnett has undertaken to deal with this; and from having resided for many years in various parts of the Turkish Empire, she is well qualified for the task. The present volume is devoted to the Christian women, and it is to be followed by another on the Semitic and Moslem women. Under the head of Christian women are included the Vlachs, the Greeks, the Armenians, and the Bulgarians; and the habits, the modes of life, and the dwellings of the female portion of these nationalities are described in considerable detail, and are illustrated in an interesting manner by the introduction of numerous popular songs and stories. To lady readers the frequent descriptions of costume will furnish an additional attraction. Perhaps the most important part of the book is that which deals with the Vlachs, because less is known of this people than of the others. Many of the Vlach customs are traced by Miss Garnett to a Roman source, such as those of anointing the door at marriage, of domestic celebrations corresponding to the worship of the Lares, of the observance of Thursday and Friday in a manner which recalls the dedication of those days to Jupiter and Venus, and of the regard paid to the household serpent. It is interesting to observe that some of these have been noticed by Schott, in his Walachische Märchen, as being found among the Roumans north of the Danube. Under the head of the Greek women, we have an account of the heroines who took part in the War of Independence and of the feats which they achieved; and details are given as to the education of Greek women in Turkey at the present day, of the handicrafts on which they are employed, and of the dances which form the chief enjoyment of their festival days. Among the curious superstitions which they practice may be noticed that of fortune-telling by means of hens during Holy Week, when a day is apportioned to each member of the family, and according to the number of eggs laid on that day will be his or her prosperity during the coming year. Of a similar custom, which is observed in Thessaly on the Eve of St. John, the following description is given:

"At sunset, a large jar is filled with water and placed in the garden. Round it the family assemble, each with a leaf or flower, which he or she throws in. A wild dance and chant are kept up all the time. The jar is then carefully covered with a linen cloth, and the youngest of the party goes through the ceremony of 'locking' it with the house-key. It is finally set aside until the following day at noon, when the family assemble for the 'unlocking.' The cloth is removed, and each looks anxiously to see if his or her leaf or flower is floating on the water, as that foretells a long life, and an immersed leaf or flower an early death."

In speaking of the Armenian women Miss Garnett mentions the elaborate customs which exist among them connected with baptism. One of these, involving as it does a remarkable superstition, deserves to be quoted:

"If, before the baby is forty days old, any animal belonging to the household has young, the child must be passed three times over the newly-born creature. If this rule is not observed, the child will grow up melancholy and a prey to malaria. It is said that young brute animals, over which this ceremony has been performed, have often been known to die of the ailments from which these traditional prescriptions have preserved the human animal."

Mr. Stuart-Glennie has prefixed to this volume two introductory chapters on "The Ethnography of Turkey," and "Folk Conceptions of Nature." The assumption from which he starts in these is that civilisation originated, "as everything we know of the historical origin of civilisation leads us to believe that it did originate," in the action of an intellectually higher on intellectually lower races; and consequently his conclusions differ from those which are generally received.

Expeditions to the Pacific. With a brief reference to the Voyages of Discovery in Seas contiguous to Canada in connexion with a Western Passage from Europe to Asia. By Sandford Fleming. (Montreal: Dawson.) Dr. Fleming is president of the Royal Society of Canada from whose Transactions this memoir is reprinted. Its object is to give a short account of all the travellers who crossed the continent through British America in the era between Sir Alexander Mackenzie's expedition in 1792 and the first through train of the Canadian Pacific Railway in 1885. Such a list is difficult to compile; for every pioneer who made the journey from Rupert's Land into British Columbia did not publish a book, or in any other manner advertise his exploit. Hence, even Dr. Fleming, whose position as engineer to the first trans-continental line through Canada gives him exceptional facilities for collecting the required data, must necessarily have failed to hear of some of these quiet journeys of unambitious men. Still, the catalogue he gives may be taken as fairly correct, very few expeditions of much importance having been omitted. However, it contains also accounts of various Arctic expeditions, and departs altogether from its avowed object in noticing the journeys of Sir Hector Langevin and Lord Dufferin, neither of whom crossed through British territory; while Lord Lorne's visit to British Columbia, being for the most part by way of the United States, has little claim to be included in Dr. Fleming's roll. Again, while pleasure trips of so little importance as these are noticed, some reference might, we think, have been made to the Boundary Commission under Colonel Hawkins. Nevertheless, with all its defects, Dr. Fleming's paper is an extremely useful contribution to the history of North-Western exploration, and is especially valuable for the local information it supplies regarding some of the less known of the early explorers; though, unfortunately, the map appended is valueless as a clue to the text, none of the routes described being laid down upon it. But after the crude stuff which the compilers of some of Mr. Bancroft's voluminous "histories" have thought fit to print, it is pleasant to read fifty pages of what is, so far as it goes, a veritable chronicle of half-forgotten pioneers and their doughty deeds.

NOTES AND NEWS.

PROF. ZUPITZA—after visits to the libraries in Cambridge and Oxford—has been, and is, working at MSS. in the British Museum, that of Gregory's Dialogues, &c. Dr. Liebermann, of Berlin, who is editing the Anglo-Saxon Laws for the Savigny Society, has also been at work at the Museum MSS. The evening studies of both learned men have, we hear, been devoted to the theatre, while their Sundays have been spent on the Thames.

FATHER WILLIAM P. NEVILLE, of the Birmingham Oratory, who was appointed by Cardinal Newman to be his literary executor, requests those who possess letters from the Cardinal to send them to him, in order that they may be made use of in publishing selections from his correspondence. He promises that all such letters sent to him shall be carefully returned to their owners.

THE Society of Arts have erected one of their memorial tablets on the house No. 19, Warwick-crescent, Maida-hill, where Robert Browning lived from the time of his return from Italy, after the death of his wife in 1861, until the summer of 1887, when he removed to 29, De Vere-gardens.

MESSRS. HACHETTE & CIE. announce an important work on early printing, to be issued under the auspices of the French minister of public instruction. The author is M. O. Thierry-Poux, of the Bibliothèque Nationale. The work will be entitled Premiers Mouvements de l'Imprimerie en France au XVI<sup>e</sup> Siècle; and it will be illustrated with 289 facsimiles, reproduced by heliogravure. During the fifteenth century the art of printing was practised in France at no less than 41 places, and there were 145 printers and booksellers.

MESSRS. F. V. WHITE & Co. will publish shortly Gustav Freytag's Reminiscences of My Life, in two volumes, translated from the German by Katharine Chetwynd.

A NEW volume of "The Book Lovers Library" is announced for immediate publication, entitled Studies in Jocular Literature, by Mr. W. C. Hazlitt.

MESSRS. HARRISON & SON will publish in a few days Shakspeare's "Macbeth" and Shaksperian Representation, by Mr. E. Gilbert Highton, accompanied by reflections upon the general interpretation of Shaksperian drama in the abstract, and as illustrated by various performances in recent years.

MR. WILLIAM HEINEMANN will publish immediately a work of fiction dealing with the story of Lazarus, written by Elizabeth Stuart Phelps and Herbert D. Ward. It is entitled Come Forth! and it forms a companion volume to The Master of the Magicians, by the same joint authors.

A STORY with the subject of hypnotism as its basis will be published by Messrs. Hutchinson & Co. in a few days. The title of the little book is Hypnotised; or, a Doctor's Confession; and it is understood to be the work of Miss Margaret Brandon, an amateur actress and composer of several songs.

MESSRS. SAMPSON LOW have now ready for issue the third edition of Bishop Bickersteth's Hymnal Companion to the Book of Common Prayer, revised and enlarged by the addition of 144 new hymns. The music has been edited by Dr. Charles Vincent, organist of Christ Church, Hampstead, and Mr. D. J. Wood, organist of Exeter Cathedral, with the assistance throughout of Sir John Stainer.

THE first edition of Prof. J. Estlin Carpenter's book, The First Three Gospels: their Origin and Relations, published by the Sunday-School Association, being exhausted, a second edition, revised and enlarged by the author, will be ready next week.

MESSRS. WILLIAM ANDREWS & Co., of Hull, will publish at an early date Yorkshire Battles, by Mr. Edward Lamplough. The work is the result of a life-long study of the subject.

MESSRS. HUTCHINSON & Co. will publish next week a third and cheaper edition of Mr. Joseph Hatton's novel, By Order of the Czar, with some additional matter which was omitted when the work was first revised for publication in book form.

MR. DAVID MAXWELL will take as the subject of his presidential address at the Hull Literary Club "Modern English Literature."

MESSRS. TRUSLOVE & SHIRLEY, publishers, &c., have removed from St. Paul's Churchyard to 143 Oxford-street—a region which seems to be growing into favour with the trade.

At the Congress of Old Catholics, held last week at Cologne, it was decided to hold, besides the annual meetings of each country, an international congress every alternate year. The first of these will be held in 1892 in Switzerland.

DR. THOMAS MUIR has published in pamphlet form (Glasgow: Robert Anderson) the address which he lately delivered before the Philosophical Society of Glasgow as president of the geographical and ethnological section. The subject is "The Territorial Expansion of the British Empire during the past Ten Years." Unfortunately, at the date when he wrote, he was unable to include the results of the latest treaties with Germany, France, and Portugal, though these are duly recorded on the large-scale map, by Messrs. George Philip & Son, which accompanies the address. But, even so, Mr. Muir calculates that, during the ten years ending with 1889, the British empire was increased by an aggregate of about 1,250,000 square miles. His method is to take each year separately, and describe the territorial aggrandisements it witnessed, together with the circumstances that led to each. We are not acquainted with any similar survey alike so comprehensive and so exact. It must have taken great pains to compile, and it deserves to be widely known.

PROF. BUCHHEIM writes:

"As the description communicated to you (ACADEMY, September 13) of my edition of Goethe's

Faust, to be published by Messrs. Bell, might be misleading, I hope you will allow me to state that the volume will virtually consist of Hayward's prose translation of the drama, with his notes and appendices, revised by myself. The only original matter that I shall contribute will be an introduction, treating of the Faust legend."

FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

CANON SCOTT HOLLAND will contribute an article on "Canon Liddon" to the next number of the Contemporary Review, which will also contain the first of three articles by Sir Thomas Farrer on "Mr. Goschen's Finance," the first half of a new story by Vernon Lee, and articles by Sir Morell Mackenzie on "The Use and Abuse of the Hospitals," by Dr. Wright on "The Shanghai Conference," by Justice O'Hagan on "Irish Patriotism," and by Dr. Geffcken on "The Economic Position of Italy."

MR. H. H. RISLEY, of the Bengal Civil Service, is preparing an article for the next number of the Asiatic Quarterly Review on German colonial aspirations, under the title of "The Idea of a Greater Germany." He has made a careful study of the subject from the German point of view during a recent sojourn in that country, joining the German Colonial Society for the purpose; and he was fortunate enough to have the opportunity of discussing the whole question with Chancellor Caprivi, Herren von Bennigsen, Windhorst, and Krauel, and others. The same number will also contain an article by Mr. Hyde Clarke, on the diplomatic history of the Behring Sea question from 1790, including the proceedings of Pitt, Canning, Wellington, &c. It also refers to the new policy affecting our Indian and Australian empires, consequent on the opening of the Northern Pacific.

THE Illustrated Naval and Military Magazine for October will contain: "In the Cavalry Ranks," by a corporal of dragoons; "Jellalabad: a reply to General Sale Hill," by Major Broadfoot; "Forced Draught and Induced Draught," by Henry Williams.

MR. J. HALL RICHARDSON, author of "Police!" "The Rogues' Gallery," &c., who has been specially engaged for many months in making personal investigations, will contribute to the new volume of Cassell's Saturday Journal a series of articles on various strange doings and mysterious scenes in the metropolis. The first article, entitled "Secret Societies of To-day" is to appear in No. 365, issued on September 24.

THE Stationer, Printer, and Fancy Trades' Register (Dean & Son) promises for October an article on the toy trade, and another tracing the development of envelope-making from the earliest times down to the last improvement.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

"SUMMER."

How sweet it is when summer's best,
Beneath broad-sheltering chestnut boughs,
At sultry noontide to take rest,
While heedlessly the cattle browse.

And hushed as children for to hear
Some tale from olden fairy lore,
To listen with unwearied ear
To all we've often heard before—

The heated hum of lagging bees,
Now burrowed in the foxglove bells;
The whispered secrets that the breeze
Among the nodding grasses tells.

The thrush that from some thicket sings
Delicious songs: the blended rhyme
From all the deep content of things
That take their fill of summertime.

And so to listen on and on,
Nor reckon how we've idly sat,
Till through the branches shows, anon,
The fitful flicker of the bat.

And far around in misty gray
Has died the golden light of noon—
Then up! and through the tumbled hay
Wend homeward by the rising moon.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THERE are several interesting articles in the September Livre, "Le Théâtre d'Alfred de Musset devant la censure" is a good historical contribution. More immediate, but perhaps less important, are a second on "Les Néo-Bibliophiles," a third on engraving in colours, and a fourth by M. Gausseron on bibliophily and livres de luxe among ourselves. In these last three we note a little taint of that mere spirit of the mode which distinguishes the mere bibliophile from the man of letters. The cry for "du nouveau" is not the scholar's cry. We confess very frankly that we think books illustrated in colour, pretty as they sometimes are, and though some of us may have been concerned with them, a rather rococo device; and M. Gausseron will meet, not from Gladstonians only, with an energetic disagreement in England when he dismisses Mr. Gladstone's book-tastes with the remark that "la théologie et la littérature homérique ont perdu beaucoup de leur saveur." We could tell M. Gausseron of Englishmen, not disinclined to roast Mr. Gladstone for his politics at a slow fire, who would very willingly feed the flames with bibliophiles who are so little catholic or scholarly as this.

THE Theologisch Tijdschrift for September contains the conclusion of Prof. Oort's elaborate examination of the Book of Hosea, the unity of which he ventures to deny. For the criticism of the text the two articles by this acute scholar supply ample material.

NOTES FROM THE LINCOLN REGISTERS.

II.

THE BUILDING OF NEWARK BRIDGE IN 1486.

As Mr. Maddison's copies of Bishop Longland's Injunctions for the reform of the convents of Nun Cotton and Studley, and of the monastery of Missenden, have been printed in Archæologia (vol. xlvii.), I forbear to quote from them, though parts of them are very interesting, and show what great need there was of a change for the better.

Bishop Russell's Register, A.D. 1480-96, contains, on leaf 23, an agreement for the rebuilding of Newark Bridge. On March 9, 1486, John Philipot, draper and alderman of Newark in Nottinghamshire, came with four other citizens to the Bishop (who was lord of the town) within the minster close of Lincoln with a bill of supplication, showing that the town bridge close by the castle of Newark had failed (been broken down) by great rage of water-floods, and that loss and decay might fall to the inhabitants if the said bridge were not speedily set up again. So the Bishop agreed to give them one hundred marks (£66 13s. 4d.), in three instalments, and the necessary stone, on the condition that they should take upon them the oversight, charge, and manner of setting-up of the said bridge, and should covenant with a sufficient carpenter for the accomplishment thereof. Alderman Philipot and his four fellow-citizens accordingly agreed, on November 30, with one Edward Downes, carpenter, of the parish of Wirksope in Nottinghamshire, as follows:

"1. The said Edward Downes hath couvenanted with the said Alderman and inhabitants of Newark aforesaid, and they with hym, that the same Edward, bi the grace of God hath taken upon hym, and graunteth, to make at his owne custes and expenses, of newe tymbre of good and sufficient oke, a brigg of the west side of the Castell of Newark, of xij Arches, euery sele tre vnder the water wherupon euery post shall stande, to be of square half a yerd or more, and in lenght according to the werke; euery post in brede xiiij ynche, and in thyknes xij ynche, and in height according to the olde brigg; euery somer tre vpon the postes heedes, in brede half a yerd, and in length a fote longer than the brede of the olde brigg. Also euery giste tre, of square xij ynche and more; and euery plauncher, of thiknes iij ynche, with the bandes accordyng to the same tymbre.

"2. Also the said Edward shal make of newe tymber, ouer the said Arches, railes upon both sides of the brigg, with the postes, of ij yerds of length—for the keyping of the bordes of the said brigg—with a crosse of tymbre to be set in the myddes of the said brigg; and euery Arche to haue a fense trefore it, as large as may be carried with any reasonable cariage."

For the timber and carpenter's work, and finishing the bridge by Michaelmas 1486, Edward Downes was to have £40 of the Bishop's £66 13s. 4d. The rest of the work the town was to do—to carry the timber and the stone from the Bishop's land; to pave the bridge; and put up a mighty stone-work at each end to defend the bridge.

"2. And as toucheng the residue of the same C marc, and the finisheng of the hool werk of the said brigg, the said Alderman and his brethren haue taken vpon them and couenanted with the said Reverend fadre, that thei, of their propre goodes, togedre with the said residue [£26 13s. 4d.] shall puruey and make to be had, cariage of all the said tymbre, and also all the costes of stone to be digged and gotten vpon the ground of the said Reuerend fadre necessarie, and to be caried to the said brigg, with all maner of other cariages, custis and charges whiche shal be done aboute the brigg—as in cariage of clay, lyme and sand, grauell and payung vpon the said brigg—and al maner of other charges to be done to the same brigg in any maner wise necessarie, except that longeth to the Carpenter aforesaid.

"And also at the west ende of the saide Brigg a myghty stonewerke for the defence and sauward of the same brigg, with ij displaies goyng out of the same stonewerk, of either side one for that partie. And in like wise at the Est ende of the same brigg, another myghty stonewerk with ij displaies as is aforesaid. All the premises—other than suche as the said Edward hath taken vpon hym to make in fourme aforesaid—to be done at the custes and expenses of the said Alderman, brethren and inhabitants, afore and bi the fest of saynt Andrewe thapostell next comyng in wynter."

CORRESPONDENCE.

OLD-NORSE NAMES IN THE IRISH ANNALS.

Seaton, Devon: Sept. 6, 1890.

Intercourse between the Irish and the Scandinavians began in 795 (when the Vikings made their first attack on Ireland), and continued for about four hundred years. As the Irish certainly wrote Annals in the ninth and tenth centuries, and as the oldest Old-Norse MS. dates from the end of the eleventh century (Paul's Grundriss, i. 426), we may expect that some light will be thrown on primeval northern speech by the Scandinavian names preserved in the Annals, as well as by the Scandinavian words borrowed by the Irish. In this expectation we shall not be wholly disappointed, though as sources for Ur-nordisch the Irish documents are not to be named with the Runic inscriptions, or even with the loan-words in Finnish and Lappish.<sup>1</sup> Compare:

Amlaib	with	A'leifr, O'láfr
Báirith, Barid	"	Bárðr
elta, erell	"	hjaltr, jarl
Fulf	"	U'lf
In-fuit, In-scoa	"	I'hvitr, í-skúar
Roalt	"	Hróaldr
Rodlaib	"	Hrolleifr
Ruadhmaid	"	Hrómundr
Tomrair, Tomrir	"	Pórer.

In Amlaib, Tomrair, Tomrir, the m merely indicates the nasality of the preceding vowel.

In the following list I have inserted, for sake of completeness and comparison, the Scandinavian names and other words which occur in the Cogadh Gaedhel re Gallaibh, ed. Todd, Dublin, 1867, and in the Book of Leinster, pp. 172<sup>a</sup>, 309<sup>a</sup>–310<sup>b</sup> of the facsimile. The former work is denoted by CGG.; the latter by LL. The Annals of Boyle are denoted by AB; the Annals of Inisfallen by AI; the Annals of Ulster by AU; the Annals of the Four Masters by FM; the Three Fragments edited by O'Donovan from a Brussels MS. by TF; and the Annals of Tigernach by Tig. The Runic forms are taken from Paul's Grundriss der germanischen Philologie and Noreen's Altisländische und Altnordische Grammatik. Identifications marked with (P) are due to Mr. York Powell.

Smurull, LL. 310<sup>b</sup>, 31 (= Murall, CGG. p. 28). Probably a nickname compounded with smör or smjör "butter."

Snadgair, CGG. 164. The -gair is probably geirr "spear": cf. Suart-gair, infra. The snad- is perhaps for nadd-, with prothetic s. Snadgair would then mean "a spear ornamented with studs" (naddr stud, nail).

Snuatgair, CGG. 40, gen. sg. of Snuad-gair = **nauð-geirr*, with prothetic s.

Somarlid, CGG. 78. Norse Sumarliði. Hence the name MacSorley.

Sortadbud sort, LL. 172<sup>a</sup>, 10. The sort is svartr. The rest of the name is obscure.

Stabball, CGG. 78. Probably an Irish nickname: cf. stapal "torch," O'B.

Stain, Sclain, Tig. 1031, 1034, Stain, AU. 851, 846, Zain, TF. 851. Norse Steinn, Runic Stainar.

Suainin, CGG. pp. 40, 206, Suainin, CGG. p. 164. Perhaps a dimin. of **Suan* = Seaur "swan," or is it Steinn?

Suairgair, AU. 1014. A compound of svartr "black," and geirr "spear."

Suimin, CGG. p. 40, a scribal error for Suinin, q.v.

Suinin, CGG. p. 206, Sunin, CGG. p. 164. Perhaps an Irish dimin. of scin "swine."

Tamar, CGG. p. 38 = Tomar, q.v.

Tolbarb, CGG. 78, for **Tolbard*, a corruption of Pórvardr (P.).

Tomar, CGG. p. 22, FM. 994. Pórr from þonar. Hence Toner.

Tomralt, FM. 923 = Icel. Pórcaldr.

Tomrir Torra, TF. p. 144. Icel. Pórrir.

Torbend dub, CGG. 164 = Torfind, q.v.

Torberdach, CGG. 40. Formed on þorbjartr? "bearded like Thor?"

Torfind, AU. 1124. Norse Þorfinnr.

Torchar mac Treni, FM. 1171. Norse Þorgeirr?

Torolbh, FM. 928 = Torulb iarla, AU. 931. Icel. Pórrlf.

Torstain mac Eric, AU. 1103. Torstan mac Eric, FM. 1103. Norse Þorsteinn. See Stain supra.

Turcall, gen. Turcaill, AU. 1124. Þorkell. Mac-Thorcaill is now MacCorkell.

Turges, AB. 791, AU. 844. Turges and Turgeis, LL. 309<sup>a</sup>. Either Þorgestr, whence Þorgestlingar, Vigf. s.v. Pórr, or Þorgis: the latter more likely (P.).

Torgelsi, F.M. 1167. Norse Þorgisti.

OLD-NORSE WORDS QUOTED.

conung, TF. 126, 228 = konungr "king."

erell, AU. 847, from erilaR, the Runic form of jarl.

far-as, CGG. 174 = hvar es "where is?" The context is: Is 'arsin tanic Plait a cath na lúreath amach, 7 asbert fothri: "Far-as Domnall?" i. cait ita Domnall? Ro[f]reair Domnall 7 asbert:

"Sund, a sniding!" ar se. "Thereafter came Plait forth from the battalion of the mailcoats and said thrice: 'Where is Domnall?' Answered Domnall, and said: 'Here, thou villain!'"—where

núi, TF. p. 164. The context is: As annsaide doralan an chrech Lochlannach inaighidh Cinnédigh. . . . Rotogbhaid gotha allmharcha barbardha annseidhe, 7 stuic lomdha badhphdha, 7 sochuidhe 'ga rádh "núi, nú!" Then the Lochlann raiders marched against Kennedy. . . . Foreign, barbarous shouts were raised there, and many warlike trumpets blown, and a multitude saying "kníe! kníe! press on, press on"—as the late G. Vigfusson orally explained the words to me. See his Icelandic-English Dictionary, s.v. Kníja.

In CGG. p. 202, the A.S. cing and prist (i.e. preost) are given as Norse words.

THE MSS. OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

Oxford: Sept. 14, 1890.

I did my best to avoid controversy with Mr. Hoskier, but he will not let me. The only remarks which I need make upon his last letter are, (1) that the views which I expressed are not really at variance with those of Dr. Hort; and (2) that in describing the text of Cod. Bezae (D) as "not eclectic," what I meant was that it is consistent in its type. Different strata there may be in it, but they all belong to the same system or family. A text cannot properly be called "eclectic" or "mixed" either because it is corrupt or because other texts have borrowed from it.

W. SANDAY.

AN OBSCURE PASSAGE IN "THE PEARL."

London: Sept. 15, 1890.

I am inclined to think that the reading proposed by Mr. Gollancz is better than my own suggestion. He seems, however, to be mistaken in saying that "koyntyse = 'wisdom,' is somewhat doubtful." In the poem of "Cleanness," which is by the same author as "The Pearl," we read "clannes is his [God's] comfort, and koyntyse he louyes": and the context shows that the sense is exactly the same as that assumed in my proposed correction. The parallels which Mr. Gollancz adduces for the form "kyntly" (= kyndely) do not appear to be quite to the point, though no doubt more exact analogies might be found.

The question of the final e in the poem needs investigation. It is quite obvious that in many cases the e (whether written or not) is not sounded as it would have been in Chaucerian verse. I had thought that the exceptional instances in which the e is apparently sounded should probably be explained in other ways, e.g., hert with a trilled r might easily scan as a disyllable. But some of the examples cited by Mr. Gollancz, and several others, seem to be refractory. Mr. Gollancz's view that the dialect is to some extent artificial may perhaps afford the true explanation of the anomalies.

HENRY BRADLEY.

INSPECTION OF ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

Stroud: Sept. 16, 1890.

In an unsigned notice of "Two Books on Education," in a recent number of the ACADEMY (September 6) I read:—

"It is monstrous that in England men should be made inspectors who have never taught a class for half an hour. This is the real grievance that English elementary teachers have, and we hope to hear soon that some courageous Vice-President has enacted that before appointment to the inspectorate a man shall produce evidence of having taught efficiently somewhere, no matter where."

Her Majesty's Inspectors are accustomed by long practice to the common lot of officials; and that is to be the only persons who know the facts, and the only ones who are not at liberty to state them. As an ex-inspector of schools, I think I may claim some knowledge of the facts, after fourteen years' experience; and, on the other hand, I feel myself untrammelled by official restraint. I do not believe that there is a single one among my old colleagues who has not had at some time or other of his life practical experience of teaching "somewhere," to use the words of your reviewer, although I beg to differ with him in thinking it does "matter where."

But I go further, and I venture to disagree with him on the whole subject. The duties of Her Majesty's Inspectors are of a more arduous, delicate, and manifold nature than the public at large are aware. Experienced managers of elementary schools and clerks of school boards will bear me out in this. The inspector must not be a pedant nor a pedagogue, but a man of wide culture, who has formed habits of observation in the everyday world of men and women, as well as children. He must be accustomed to use his eyes in a variety of matters, should be a ready, sympathetic, and discerning judge of character, able to unbend at times and have a chat with the children, whose sharp little instinct would at once detect and fight shy of one who had sat too long in the teacher's chair. And it is a great help in the impartial observing and comparing of different teachers' work and their practical success with children if an inspector comes to his duties with an unprejudiced spirit, and with as few pet methods and crotchets and hobbies of his own as the weakness of human nature will allow.

WILLIAM MARKHEIM.

SCIENCE.

"CONTEMPORARY SCIENCE SERIES." — The Criminal. By Havelock Ellis. (Walter Scott.)

THE scientific study of criminal anthropology is a thing of recent date. It may be said to have begun with Lauvergne's book, Les Forçats, published in 1841. Lauvergne was the chief medical officer in the hospital for convicts at Toulon, and his observations were largely directed towards the element of disease, mental or physical, in the criminal constitution. "Disease" was for some time regarded as the key to the problem of criminality, till Despine in his Psychologie Naturelle (1868) made it clear that criminals possessed as a class certain well marked moral characteristics which were by no means necessarily associated with definite pathological conditions, mental or physical. "Moral insanity" was the term which he devised to explain what was most characteristic in criminal psychology; and guided by this clue he contributed to the study of criminal anthropology some important conclusions which are not likely to be overthrown, although they may be differently expressed. But the evidences for the association of criminality with a certain physical type began to press for an explanation. Dr. Maudsley has affirmed, as a matter of unquestionable fact, that the instinctive criminal constitutes "a degenerate or morbid variety of mankind, marked by peculiarly low physical and mental characteristics." These characteristics began to be minutely and scientifically investigated. The criminal's whole physical system was subjected to accurate observation, his mental aptitudes and limitations were recorded, a most ingenious instrument has been devised to register his emotional susceptibility to excitations of various kinds. Thousands of descriptions were recorded by trained and intelligent observers, and a standard of judgment was obtained by similar examination of normal persons, although this essential department of the new study has certainly not been sufficiently attended to heretofore. At last sufficient data seemed to have been collected to make it worth while to seek for a theory to connect them. That this theory should have been an application of the Darwinian doctrine of evolution was natural. The criminal, with his flattened forehead and acrocephalic occiput, his scanty beard, his sallow complexion, his long arms, his large ears, his strange agility, his abnormal development of the orbital sinus (a feature noticed in gorillas and in savages), his unbridled egotism, his want of reflection and foresight, his animal passions, his hatred of steady industry, was a case of atavism, of reversion to an inferior ancestral type, a product of the same forces which occasionally produce a child with traces of a far more distant ancestry in the shape of cervical auricles, or supernumary nipples, or webbed toes. This theory has largely served to guide investigation ever since its first promulgation in Dr. Cesare Lombroso's L'Uomo Delinquente in 1876. Of the career of this remarkable man Mr. Ellis gives an interesting sketch. By his amazing industry, his generalising faculty, his wide literary culture, and, not least, by his willingness to revise his own theories in the light of later evidence, he worthily represents the first great epoch in the history of the new science.

That the phenomenon of atavism has some true connexion with criminality can hardly be doubted. But that connexion may be one of correlation, not of causality. Atavistic phenomena often accompany criminality; but other phenomena, not atavistic, also play a large part in helping us to recognise a distinct criminal type. The weak muscular system of the criminal, for instance, and his liability to heart disease and to consumption—these characteristics do not come from the savage or the ape. And how misleading the comparison may be between acts proper to the criminal classes in the present day and those recorded of persons who were not regarded as criminals in lower stages of social evolution may be clearly seen from the last link in the following catena of fallacies:

"Of a very great number of modern habitual criminals it may be said that they have the misfortune to live in an age in which their merits are not appreciated. Had they been in the world a sufficient number of generations ago the strongest of them might have been chiefs of a tribe."—(L. Owens Pike.)

"Some of them would have been the ornament and moral aristocracy of a tribe of Red Indians."—(Tarde.)

"The criminal of to-day is the hero of our old legends."—(Prof. Prins.)

"How many of Homer's heroes would to-day be in a convict prison!"—(Colajanni.)

Now, the criminal who would have been chief of a tribe would certainly have been so by virtue of qualities gained from his birth in a higher civilisation, and in spite, not by reason, of his natural characteristics. And as for Colajanni's remark about the situation which the nineteenth century would consider appropriate for "Homer's heroes," Mr. Ellis, who is a man of letters as well as a man of science, really should not have quoted this grotesque absurdity as if he believed it. Achilles and Odysseus lived under another moral code than ours; but they were not less sensitive than we are to the claims of the moral law, as they understood it. And if they could appear in our society, this moral sensitiveness, this aîdôs, which the Greeks rated as the very crown and flower of virtue, would enable them to adapt themselves to it. Homer knew what a vicious man was like, and in Thersites portrayed him with an accuracy that, as Mr. Ellis knows (p. 26), extends even to physical characteristics which the investigations of the present day have determined as belonging to the criminal type. The lack of aîdôs, which Thersites exhibited is the grand characteristic of the vicious nature. Explain how that is produced, and we have gone far to explain the production of a criminal class. And the facts accumulated, so far, appear to justify us in thinking that the problem will not long await a satisfactory solution. In the first place, we must recognise that no single formula will account for all the phenomena. The criminal character may be due to the social milieu in which the man is born; or it may be formed after maturity, by imperceptible degrees, during a course of crime which may have had beginnings scarcely recognisable as vicious; or it may be traceable to definite morbid conditions, in particular to affections of the brain, such as meningitis. But the frequency with which these affections are found to be associated with criminality may be itself, in many cases, rather a symptom than a cause. The physical nature of the instinctive criminal is of a low order; he lacks constitutional vitality, and is therefore more liable than other men to morbid affections of any kind. His is no fiery, energetic temperament—he is sluggish, callous, obtuse, "markedly deficient," writes Mr. Ellis, "in physical sensibility," on which "physical insensibility rests that moral insensibility, or psychical analgesia, as it has been called, which is the criminal's most fundamental mental characteristic." Sometimes, however, as might be expected, he displays a morbid sensibility, a facility of emotion which covers an impenetrable inner hardness and cynicism.

Wainwright, the forger and poisoner, is recorded to have wept tears of gratitude and happiness over Wordsworth's poems, and he certainly possessed a very vivid appreciation of art. Paul Verlaine, who has suffered imprisonment for an attempt to murder, is a poet of unmistakable genius, excelling, as Mr. Ellis writes, "in delicate passages of vague and mystic reverie, in sudden lines of poignant emotion." And of Wainwright and Verlaine it can be asserted (as it probably cannot of Villon, the best-known example of the criminal in literature) that they belong to the type of congenital or instinctive criminality. Here is Mr. Ellis's description of the head of Verlaine, of one of whose delicate lyrics the readers of the ACADEMY lately enjoyed a charming translation from the pen of Mr. Arthur Symonds:

"Verlaine's very remarkable head, though large, is the head of a criminal much more than of a man of genius, with its heavy jaw, projecting orbital arches, and acrocephalic occiput with central ridge—the head which the acute Lauvergne called Satanic."

When evidences of atavism occur in connexion with criminality, they are probably to be explained as a manifestation of tendencies latent in every one of us, which some impoverishment of constitutional vitality has permitted to assert themselves with unusual emphasis. In the long run it appears that the higher and progressive instincts root themselves most willingly in a finely organised and fully developed physical nature. Let that be stunted or impoverished, and the man may too easily become a prey to forces which drag him backwards and downwards in the scale of evolution. All his instincts and capacities are dulled, save those which make for immediate self-gratification, those which we have in common with everything that lives, and which are naturally the last to feel the deadening effects of any lowering of the vital energy. Most commonly the unhealthy condition is of ante-natal origin. Thus, advanced age, or great disparity of age, in parents seems to be a factor in the production both of criminality and of idiocy. Dr. Antonio Marro, of Turin, has found that over 50 per cent. of murderers whose cases he had investigated were children of fathers who had entered upon the "period of decadence"—i.e., who had passed their fortieth year. This is more than double the proportion which appears to obtain in the case of normal persons. But some definite injury, some cerebral affection, the result of an accident received in childhood, may also induce a disposition of the kind called criminal. M. Tarde has illustrated, with a Frenchman's apt use of imagery for scientific purposes, the manner in which atavistic instincts may come to assert themselves under these circumstances. Even thus, he observes, when bridges have been broken down in time of war the inhabitants will take to the old fords, or to primitive kinds of food in time of famine; or a river, when dammed, will turn to flow in some earlier and long disused bed.

Moral philosophy will, of course, have a word to say on the conclusions towards which criminal anthropology is advancing, but what that word will be Mr. Ellis does not attempt to indicate. Nor shall we; but it may be well to observe that while vice is distinctly shown to be frequently a result of causes purely physical, its cure, in spite of physical drawbacks, by forces purely or mainly moral, is also a matter of evidence. There is no remedy for vice in the pharmacopoeia; but other remedies there are, which sympathy, patience, and intelligence can use with striking effect. Take this interesting case related by Mr. Ellis, from the West Riding Asylum Reports, vol. vi. (Dr. H. Sutherland):

"Miss B—, nineteen years of age, the daughter of a captain in the army, is described as a tall, robust-looking girl of lively temperament. When a few months old she had an attack of meningitis, was always wilful and troublesome. When she was eighteen years old she developed new instincts of mischief. She would sometimes take off her clothes, stuff them up the chimney, and set fire to them. . . . She had frequently destroyed furniture, clothing, and books. She liked to cut carefully the strings binding a book so that it would fall to pieces in the hands of the unsuspecting person who took it up. She drenched a baby, and frequently her own room, with water without any reason. She once attempted to throttle the attendant in whose care she was put. She was backward for her age, though her education had not been neglected; she could not keep accounts, and was fond of reading children's books. There was a history of bad sexual habits, and she had a propensity to fall in love with every man she saw. She was perfectly coherent and rational, and accused others of doing the mischievous acts attributed to her." Abnormalities of behaviour are here rather more marked than usual, but the case indicates the stuff of which instinctive criminals are made. And in another class of life this girl would probably have spent the best part of her days in a convict prison. But mark the event. She was placed in the home of a clergyman who, after some time, succeeded in eliciting her higher social instincts, and she eventually recovered.

The practical bearing of the new science is one of obvious importance. Before long it will, in all progressive countries, have abolished the system of punishment by imprisonment for a fixed term. This step, which, we learn from Mr. Ellis, was first advocated by an Englishman, Frederick Hill, has already been adopted in several of the United States. The hospital patient is not detained for a pre-arranged period, and to prescribe the period beforehand is not less impractical in the place of the criminal. He must stay till he is cured. And it will be required that the medical officer of each prison shall be a trained criminal anthropologist, who can classify each case and direct its treatment. At present law looks solely at the crime; not at all, for any practical purpose, at the criminal. Many persons are sentenced every year whose exposure to the influences of ordinary prison life is nothing short of moral murder.

Imprisonment in the present day has little or no deterrent effect upon the criminal classes. Modern humanitarian reforms have deprived it of the real terrors it once possessed. But, while ceasing to be deterrent, it has not yet become remedial; on the contrary, the prison is usually a school of vice, a hotbed of contamination. A new Howard is needed to awaken society to the mischiefs and cruelties of the present system, but, indeed, the way to improvement has already been made clear for all to see. Mr. Ellis has done well to devote so much of his space to an account of the system of treatment adopted with such astonishing results in the Elmira Reformatory of New York. It realises the wonderful picture of Mr. Eden's reforms given by Charles Roade in Never Too Late to Mend. As a narrative of things not dreamt but actually done upon this earth, it is difficult to imagine anything more profoundly interesting and significant than the annual reports of this institution.* For an easily accessible account of the system we may refer the English reader to Mr. Ellis.

Mr. Ellis modestly disclaims all originality for his book; but it is nevertheless one which testifies in every page, not only to his industry, but to his critical intelligence. Within the compass of little over 300 pages he has given a most lucid and interesting survey of the whole field of criminal anthropology, as that science stands at the present day. He has chosen his material from many sources, and he has been guided in the choice by a wide appreciation of the various issues of the subject. The sociologist, the philosopher, the philanthropist, the novelist, —all, indeed, for whom the study of human nature has any attraction—will find Mr. Ellis full of interest and suggestiveness. It may be hoped that he will awaken in England the attention to criminal anthropology which has hitherto been lacking in this quarter. English observers have contributed many valuable data to the science, but they have rarely been guided by a scientific conception of the subject; and at the last International Congress of Criminal Anthropology, held in Paris in 1890, while delegates came from Servia and Roumania, from Peru, Paraguay, and even Hawaii, there was not one from Great Britain. The next Congress will be held in Brussels in 1892—let us hope that the effect of Mr. Ellis's book on English opinion may be then clearly visible.

There is just one branch of the subject on which it might have occurred to Mr. Ellis to give us more information than he has done. The criminal is examined first as regards his physical characteristics—such as cranium, features, hair, motor activity, physical sensibility; then from the psychical point of view—his intelligence, vanity, sentiment, religion, criminal literature and art, &c. But under the psychical section we have no sub-section devoted to criminal humour. Nor, we may add, in the whole series of the Archives de l'Anthropologie Criminelle up to date is there any paper dealing with this aspect of the criminal mind—one which to an investigator who understood the psychology of the subject might yield extremely interesting results.

THE YENISSEI INSCRIPTIONS—INSCR. NO. I.

Barton-on-Humber: Sept. 6, 1890.

Inscription No. I., mortuary as being commemorative, not sepulchral, reads as follows:

1. Ing : khuri : χῆς : αι
Of-the-people a-memorial (this) grave (is).
Kmlari : djkaeri : ing : ai

Khuuliq : ue : luq : Djindjka : xi together-with-Khulagu (and) Djingghiz
: aelu
both.

In illustration, I give the family pedigree and regnal years:

Djingghiz ob. 1227

The inscription appears to belong to the latter part of the reign of Khubilai; his younger brother and lieutenant, Khulagu, was renowned for his conquests in Western Asia.

Ing. Tchangatai il, "people"; gen. n. ug.
Khuri or khurih. Cf. Tchangatai guch (= guwah), Osmanli xeha-det, "token," "testimony." The intermingling of dialects in such an inscription is almost as of course. It may be remembered that the two eldest sons of Djingghiz were Jugi (=Tchangatai g'ügi, "l'enfant favori, nom propre") and Tchangatai (= c'agataj, "nom de plusieurs tribus dans l'Asie centrale, brave, honnête").

Xkskxæi (vide ACADEMY, March 22, 1890, p. 208).

Djkzæi. Cf. Mongol jeke, Buriatic jike, jixe, "great." In Inscription III. 6, the word appears with the Mongol plural ending nut (vide ACADEMY, June 28, 1890, p. 448).

Æilueu. Tchagatai ulu, "high"; so ulu-p, "hero."

Sxuæ (vide ACADEMY, March 22, 1890, p. 209).

Ziucæ. Mongol c'u, "also."

Ma. Cf. Mongol ba, "and" (vide ACADEMY, May 4, 1889, p. 309).

Eguq. Mongol ikek-er, "monument."

Lug. Mongol luka, luga, ending of the comitative case. This passage exactly illustrates Castrén's remark that in Buriatic the "Binde-wort" and falls, and is at times expressed by the comitative.

Xi-ælu. An interesting and very conclusive form; the Tchagatai ikeö = "the pair," i-ke-öle, "both," Mongol xueghole. The Tchagatai and Osmanli i-ki, Yakute ik-ki, Arintzi ki (-nae), Etruscan ci, and Yenissei (Inscr.) xi = "2." The form aole appears in Inscription XVII. 3.

ROBERT BROWN, JUN.

SCIENCE NOTES.

PROF. W. ALLEYNE NICHOLSON will deliver a course of twelve lectures in connexion with the Swiney trust at the Natural History Museum, Cromwell-road, on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays during October at 3 p.m., beginning on October 6. The subject of these lectures, which are open free to the public, is "The Microscope in Geology, with special reference to the Structure and Origin of the Stratified Rocks."

At the last meeting of the general committee of the British Association, held at Leeds on Wednesday, September 10, the following grants of money were voted for scientific purposes, in accordance with the report of the committee of recommendations:

Mathematics and Physics.—Sir W. Thomson—seismological phenomena of Japan, £10; Prof. Carey Foster—electrical standards, £100; Lord McLaren—meteorological observations on Ben Nevis, £50; Prof. Fitzgerald—electrolysis, £5; Mr. G. J. Symons—photographs of meteorological phenomena, £5; Prof. O. J. Lodge—discharge of electricity from points, £10; Prof. Liveing—ultra violet rays of solar spectrum, £50; Mr. John Murray—seasonal variations of temperature, £20.

Chemistry.—Prof. Roberts-Austen—analysis of iron and steel, £10; Prof. Tilden—isomeric naphthalene derivatives, £25; Prof. H. E. Armstrong—formation of haloid salts, £25; Dr. Thorpe—action of light upon dyes, £20.

Geology.—Prof. Prestwich—erratic blocks, £10; Mr. R. Etheridge—fossil phyllopoda, £10; Mr. W. Whitaker—the Geological Record, £100; Prof. J. Geikie—photographs of geological interest, £10; Dr. H. Woodward—lias beds in Northamptonshire, £25; Dr. H. Woodward—registration of type specimens of British fossils, £10; Mr. H. Bauerman—volcanic phenomena of Vesuvius, £10; Prof. E. Hull—underground waters, £5; Mr. J. W. Davis—investigation of Elbolton Cave, £25.

Biology.—Prof. W. H. Flower—Marine Biological Association at Plymouth, £30; Prof. Michael Foster—Botanical Station at Peradeniya, £50; Prof. A. C. Haddon—improving deep-sea tow-net, £40; Mr. A. W. Wills—disappearance of native plants, £5; Prof. W. H. Flower—zoology of the Sandwich Islands, £100; Prof. W. H. Flower—zoology and botany of the West India Islands, £100.

Geography.—Dr. Garson—nomad tribes of Asia Minor and Northern Persia, £30.

Mechanical Science.—Sir J. Douglass—action of waves and currents in estuaries, £150.

Anthropology.—Prof. Flower—new edition of Anthropological Notes and Queries, £50; Prof. Flower —anthropometric laboratory, £10; Dr. E. B. Tylor—North-Western tribes of Canada, £200; Sir W. Turner—habits of natives of India, £10; Mr. G. J. Symons—corresponding societies, £25.

Total, £1,335.

In view of the fact that the committee of recommendations had not sanctioned the renewal of the grant for the use of a table at the Naples Zoological station, Capt. Noble, president of Section G, undertook to provide the necessary funds for the coming year. Committees were appointed for dealing with the following subjects, which did not involve grants of money:—Meteoric dust, underground temperatures, magnetic observations, solar radiations, electro-optics, bibliography of solution, history of chemistry, bibliography of spectroscopy, spectra of the elements, properties of solutions, silent discharge of electricity, oxygen and other gases, erosion of seacoasts, earth-tremors, migration of birds, teaching in science, graphic methods in mechanical science, evidences of prehistoric inhabitants in the British islands, &c.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

THE time for subscribing to Prof. Gallée's edition of Old-Saxon Texts, announced in the ACADEMY of July 19, has been extended to November 1. In addition to what was there stated, we may mention that one of the plates will contain a phototype facsimile of some very interesting seventh-century drawings by an Anglo-Saxon hand. The text accompanying the plates is written in German; but an English version will also be published, provided that a sufficient number of English subscribers come forward by the date mentioned. The publisher is Mr. E. J. Brill, Leiden, Holland.

THE last number of the Journal of Philology (Macmillan) contains another of Prof. Ridgeway's ingenious contributions to the criticism of the history of Britain in early Roman times. He here deals comprehensively, in eight pages, with the much-debated question of Caesar's two invasions, quoting the available materials and also the modern theories. The conclusions he seeks to establish are three: (1) That Caesar started from the same point in both his expeditions; (2) that this point was the bay lying between Cape Grisnez and the village of Wissant, Cape Grisnez being the ῥῆς Ἰλίου of Strabo and the Ἰλίου ἕκρον of Ptolemy—a headland, and not a harbour; and (3), from a rude criterion based upon Strabo's estimate of the distance, that Caesar landed, not at Deal or on Romney Marsh, but at Pevensey. Among the other articles we can only briefly mention Mr. Arthur Platt's Homerica; Mr. D. G. Hogarth's elaborate account of the Gerousia of Hierapolis, based upon inscriptions; Mr. T. W. Allen's vindication of a thirteenth century date assigned to the Townley Homer by the editors of the Palaeographical Society, against their German critics; Prof. Nettleship's notes on the Vatican Latin Glossary 3321; Mr. Robinson Ellis's convincing exposition of a vexed passage in Propertius (III., 18, 3-6); the discussion between Mr. C. A. M. Fennell and Mr. Platt on the structure of the iambic trimeter; and—last, but not least—the Rev. Dr. C. Taylor's careful examination in later literature of a quaint saying about almsgiving in the "Didache."

FINE ART.

THE HYKSÔS OR SHEPHERD KINGS OF EGYPT.

Gli Hyksôs. By the Rev. C. A. de Cara. (Rome: i Lincei.)

DR. DE CARA has devoted a sumptuous volume to one of the most interesting but, at the same time, one of the most obscure periods in ancient history, that of the rule of the Hyksôs, or shepherd kings, in Egypt. For more than five hundred years Northern Egypt was ruled by strangers who had conquered the country, but after a time had themselves been conquered by the culture and spirit of the Egyptian race. Nevertheless, they never became amalgamated with that race. Their rule was borne with sullen hatred; and, at last, a long and obstinate war broke out between them and the native princes of Thebes. The war ended in the expulsion of the foreigner, in the rise of the XVIIIth Dynasty, and in the prosecution of a war of vengeance in that Asia from which the Hyksôs invaders had originally come.

Their long sojourn in the Delta, however, must have made some impression on the character and racial purity of the inhabitants of that part of Egypt, and the history of their expulsion is one upon which modern statesmen may do well to reflect. Moreover, the student of Asiatic history feels sure that their invasion of Egypt must have been due to causes which ought to have a special interest for himself, while the long-continued existence of Asiatic rulers in the North of Egypt cannot but have had important consequences for the neighbouring populations of Palestine.

It is, therefore, doubly unfortunate that our information in regard to the Hyksôs should be so scanty, and that the history of their domination should still present so many unsolved problems. Even their physiological type is a matter of dispute. Dr. de Cara follows the generality of scholars in discovering it in certain sphinxes and other monuments found at Sâh, the Hyksôs capital; but M. Golénischeff has lately brought forward some powerful reasons for believing that the type of these monuments is earlier than the age of the Hyksôs, and goes back, in fact, to the period of Amen em-hat III. of the XIIth Dynasty.

The interest which attaches to the Hyksôs and the provokingly little that we know about them, make Dr. de Cara's elaborate book very welcome. In it he puts together all that is ascertained in regard to them, criticises the theories that have been propounded on their behalf, and suggests a theory of his own. Nothing that has been published on the subject seems to have escaped his notice. His learning is catholic; and so far from holding that only one country in Europe is possessed of the prerogative of knowledge, he quotes French and English as well as German authors. His own view is that the Hyksôs represented a confederacy of various Asiatic tribes under the leadership of the northern Syrians. That their ruling class came from this part of the world seems to me clear from the name of their supreme god Sutekh, who occupied among them the position of the Semitic Baal. Not only was Sutekh the name of the Hittite god, as we learn from the monuments of Ramses II.; but one of the cities of northern Syria commemorated by Thothmes III., at Karnak, was Satekh-beg, in which Mr. Tomkins is plainly right in seeing the name of Sutekh. It is only strange that the name is not found in the Old Testament or a Phœnician inscription.

Dr. de Cara, who identifies the Hyksôs stronghold Avaris with Pelusium, connects the name of the latter with the Semitic word which has given us the name of the Falashas in Ethiopia, and perhaps of the Philistines in Asia. It would mean the town of the "wanderers." The etymology is ingenious, and is supported by the Egyptian equivalent of Pelusium. It may be that it will yet be verified when the ancient "key of Egypt" has been subjected to the spade of the excavator.

CORRESPONDENCE.

IRISH AND EASTERN ART.

Bardwell Rectory, Bury St. Edmunds :
September 11, 1890.

There is a star-like design, frequently found in early Irish art, both in architecture and in MS. illuminations, the identification of which has hitherto baffled all writers on the subject. Specimens of it may be seen on an initial N in the Book of Kells (Miss Stokes, Early Christian Art in Ireland p. 15, fig. 6), and on the doorway of Cormac's Chapel (ibid., p. 193, fig. 102). All that this distinguished writer ventures to say is that it "may be held to signify a flower."

I have just been reading through Dr. Tylor's paper on "The Winged Figures of the Assyrian and other Ancient Monuments" contributed to the Proceedings of the Society of Biblical Archaeology, June 1890. It seems to me that this Irish ornament is identical with the Assyrian ornament which figures in the border of a sculpture from Persepolis there depicted (Plate iv. fig. 17). Dr. Tylor ingeniously and convincingly concludes that this star-like ornament or rosette represents the head of the palm (p. 10).

If, as it seems to me, the Assyrian and the Irish rosette are identical, we have one more trace established of the influence of the East on Irish art; and one more vegetable form, "the palm" must be added to the trefoil as found in use in early Celtic decoration.

The suggestion of this identity is fortified by the resemblance of some early Irish sculptured designs (Miss Stokes, Early Christian Architecture in Ireland, figs. 95, 100, 102), to the very conventional representation of the palm tree in Assyrian art.

May I take this opportunity of asking my correspondents on this and kindred subjects to note my change of address as indicated above.

THE LONGHOUSE CROMLECH.

Durham : Sept. 14, 1890.

Mr. Griffiths writes to me to deny the statement of his servant that he intended to overthrow the Cromlech on his farm, and says it is "incorrect." I am heartily glad that such is the case, and trust he will forthwith put it under the protection of the Act for the Preservation of Ancient Monuments.

GREVILLE J. CHESTER.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE third exhibition of the Arts and Crafts Society will open, at the New Gallery, on Monday, October 3; the private view is fixed for the preceding Saturday.

MR. W. H. GOODYEAR, of New York, is now in London, preparing for the publication of his magnum opus, "The Grammar of the Lotus"—a work which he has had in preparation for several years, and which is of the first importance as regards the history and development of decorative art in the ancient East. Mr. Goodyear, it will be remembered, is the author of a remarkable paper entitled "The Origin of the Ionic Capital and of the Anthemion," which appeared in 1888 in the American Journal of Archaeology, and of which, at the time, a résumé was given in the ACADEMY.

MR. WALTER SICKERT—the engaging and interesting young impressionist painter—following the example of Sir James Linton, Mr. W. P. Frith, Mr. Roscoe Mullins, and one or two other artists in painting or sculpture, will, in the middle of October open an atelier to students. The atelier is situated at 10, Glebe-studios, Glebe-place, Chelsea.

MR. R. A. STERNDALÉ will contribute an article to the Asiatic Quarterly Review for October on "Cyclopean Architecture of Asiatic Origin in Polynesia," which derives its chief interest from the fact that the descriptions are from notes made on the spot by his late brother, who spent many years in exploring the ruins in Central America and the Pacific Isles. The architecture (if it deserves the name) of the present Polynesians is of so simple a character that the stupendous remains of the former inhabitants of those islands afford an interesting field for speculation.

LAST week the destruction by fire was announced of the famous mosque of Santa Sophia at Salonica, together with a great part of that city. This week the news has come of the burning of a portion of the Palace of the Alhambra at Granada. The portion burnt consists of the magnificent Sala de la Barca and the right wing of the Arrayanez Court. There is already talk of "restoration."

THE Greek government has granted a piece of land for the proposed Italian School at Athens. The site chosen is near the military hospital, and not far from the buildings of the British and American Schools.

THE STAGE.

STAGE NOTES.

THE opening of the Lyceum this evening, rather than the opening of what used to be called "The National Theatre"—which has taken place already—marks the beginning of the theatrical season. The purely intellectual playgoer is but little concerned with Drury Lane, though no one excels Mr. Augustus Harris in enterprise, and in the understanding of his own large public; and it is to Mr. Irving's production of Mr. Hermann Merivale's version of The Bride of Lammermoor that the curiosity of the literary will mostly tend. Almost contemporaneously with the production of this piece of Mr. Merivale's—which is said to have been in Mr. Irving's portfolios for the last ten years—comes the adaptation at the Avenue Theatre of La Lutte pour la Vie. But, meanwhile, there is little to record.

MRS. LANGTRY has clenched the negotiations for the management of the Princess's Theatre. She takes the place for a twelvemonth; and it will be particularly interesting to see what she will make of the part of Cleopatra, which she plays for the first time in London, before the autumn season is far advanced.

MEANTIME, let us chronicle briefly the proceedings and prospects of the theatre in Paris. At the Français there is still stagnation, and what is called a modern repertory, already waxed old. A very energetic management signalises its possession of the Variétés by the production—which cannot be long delayed—of a new three-act comedy by Meilhac, to be called "Ma Cousine." In this piece the principal parts will be assigned to Mlle. Réjane and M. Baron. The Théâtre des Menus Plaisirs will more than vie with the Variétés in activity. They have reproduced there, already, "L'Assommoir," which had such a success years ago at the Ambigu, when Mdlle. Hélène Petit's performance of Gervaise was astonishingly full of poetry, charm, and, withal, naturalness. Mdlle. Cogé—a young actress of whom much is expected—now fills this part. Mdlle. Silviac is "la grande Virginie"—about as "realistic" and disagreeable a young woman as was ever placed by the imagination of an author upon the boards of a theatre. Coupeau falls to the lot of M. Peray, who has already played in "Germinal" at the Bouffes du Nord. When "L'Assommoir" shall have run its course, there will be brought forward an arrangement, by Guy de Maupassant and Busnach, of the novel of the first-named writer, called Bel-Ami. It remains to be seen how far the hard and unsympathetic, if assured and sustained, talent of M. de Maupassant is translatable upon the boards. For the first time at the Odéon, they have—in recognition presumably of the subsidy accorded to the second literary theatre—produced a one-act piece of Marivaux's called "Les Sincères." It is of course not so well known even to the reader as is "Le Legs." Of "Le Secret de Gilberte"—a larger and a wholly new piece at the Odéon—we shall shortly be able to give some further particulars. Suffice it to say, for the moment, that it is the work of a quite unknown young man.

MUSIC.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

WE have received from Hutchings & Romer:

Beauty and the Beast. Cantata. By King Hall. The words are humorous and the music is clever. The chorus No. 4, "Away and Away," with its points of imitation and its "howling wolves" section, is effective. Chorus No. 9 is likewise a good number. The composer is, however, apt to fall back occasionally on somewhat commonplace melodies and rhythms, as, for example, in the opening chorus.

Funny Folks Concert Cantata for Children. By James Greenhill. This is a short and amusing little work. The music is not pretentious, and on the whole pleasing. It is written for pianoforte with "toy instruments ad lib."; but, so far as we can judge from reading the pianoforte score, the latter would add considerably to the effect.

Mozart's Ave Verum and Andante by Beethoven. Transcribed for violin and piano by Tivadar Nachéz. Mozart's "celestial prayer," as it has been styled by a great French composer, is so admirably written for voices that the present arrangement seems almost a desecration. Moreover, the transcriber has made some unwarrantable alterations in the values of the bass notes, putting, for example, in one place, two tied semibreves instead of four minims. The Beethoven Andante is taken from No. 3 of the Sechs Bagatellen (Op. 126). Here again, Mr. Nachéz has taken liberties with the text, and has altogether altered the original effects by doubling notes in chords.

Feldblumen, No. 1 in C, No. 2 in D flat, by R. W. Oberhoffer, are two light pieces for the pianoforte. The music is somewhat rambling. Of the two we prefer the second.

Life's Thorny Cross, by C. Locknane, is a poor ballad with a monotonous accompaniment.

L'Española, by the same composer, is a light and much more attractive song.

From C. Woolhouse:

A Reconciliation. Song, written and composed by Gerard F. Cobb, is a graceful and flowing composition. Mr. Cobb, in the accompaniment, shows his harmonic skill. It almost seems as if he had the organ in mind while writing, for some of his chords are quite beyond the reach of ordinary hands. Any attempt to play what is written would cause jerkiness, and thereby spoil the legato phrases.

Lurline, by Gustav Ernest, is a not very original pianoforte piece, but is good practice for a melody divided between both hands.

Second Gondoliera, Op. 17, No. 2, is a pleasant piece. We like it better than the preceding, though it is not particularly striking.

From Paterson & Sons—

A Heart in Armour, by Hamish MacCunn. This is a bold, well-written song; and the accompaniment, with its varied rhythm and well-chosen harmonies, adds to the interest. Nevertheless, we shall hope for still better things from the composer. The words are from Mr. George Barlow's "Pageant of Life. Flowers Ungathered, by A. Hervey. This is an unpretentious song, and somewhat quaint. The accompaniment is good. Bygone Times, by A. E. Armstrong, is a song of ordinary type. Sacred Series of Songs. These form part of the Strathearn collection. They consist of well-known hymns. The arrangements for four voices are by A. Stella, but we cannot praise them.

SAINT MONICA.

By MRS. BENNETT-EDWARDS.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY.

"'SAINT MONICA' is a society novel remarkable alike for originality and power. It may easily be understood that the excess of devotion and self-abandonment exemplified in Veronica and George Westbury respectively require a good deal of ingenious writing-up to bring them within the limits of credibility. However, Mrs. Bennett-Edwards has proved herself equal to the task, and must be regarded as a clever, as well as daring, manipulator of subjects decidedly risky in treatment."—Academy.

"The author's heroine, Veronica Connyston, is from the commencement admitted to be a supporter of some of the most advanced theories of the day.... Her attitude towards this passionate and headstrong woman is one of the most curious features of a curious.... book."—Morning Post.

"This is one of the many volumes to which the controversy about marriage has given rise.... The volume is written with a considerable amount of power and convincingness."

Bristol Mercury.

"We do not know whether the author means this book to be one of 'those objectionable, as a rule, productions—a novel with a purpose,' to quote her own words. If it has a purpose, we may possibly find it in some words of her heroine: 'If the laws of this country have made it impossible for a man to get rid of a woman by cleaner means than by driving her to vulgar sin, the law, not the man, is responsible.'—Spectator."

THE SAGA LIBRARY.

By WILLIAM MORRIS,

Author of "The Earthly Paradise;"

With the assistance of EIRIKR MAGNUSSON.

It is proposed to publish under the above title a series of translations of the works of the early literature of the North, produced by the Icelanders, in their present form, mostly in the thirteenth and first part of the fourteenth centuries.

These works stand quite alone amongst the writings of the Middle Ages, and form a school of literature which has very special claims on the attention of the students of history and the lovers of imaginative writing. These claims may be briefly stated thus:—In the first place it is by these means alone that any continuous record of events in the early history of Scandinavia has been preserved.

Next, they form the great treasury of the mythology of the whole Teutonic Race; the record of which without them would be scanty and meagre to the last degree, but which they have preserved in great freshness and copiousness.

Again, they illustrate in much detail the laws and social customs of the Scandinavians at a very important period—the period of transition from the tribal to the feudal condition of Society. And it must be remembered on this head that Iceland owes its population to one phase of the struggle between tribal society and inchoate feudalism; and that the chieftains who fled with their households before the rising power of Harald Hair-fair, and settled in Iceland, were the very pick of all that was free and independent in Norway.

Once more, in the course of this storing up of the records of history, Icelandic literature gives incidentally a very vivid picture of the general manners and customs of the North in the early Middle Ages.

It is clear that on these grounds only the Icelandic Sagas would be of very great interest to all students of history; but they may also claim the attention of the general public as purely literary works, showing the highest possible skill in narrative, great dramatic force, and perception of individual character. Indeed, it is chiefly on these grounds, on their literary quality, that we call the attention of English-speaking readers to them.

The Middle Ages, both in art and literature, were above all epical; to tell the story of an event was, they deemed, the main function of the arts of expression; whereas in the succeeding age art and literature became rhetorical, and their business then was the production of style, according to certain arbitrary rules which it was thought would have been approved of by the Romans of the Augustan Age—if they could have known of them.

Yet this epical feeling of the Middle Ages was for the most part somewhat marred by memories, however vague, of the departed glories of classical Rome. Even in Chaucer's works, e.g., master of epic as he was, there are tokens of the working of the poison of rhetoric which drove the energies of the Elizabethan period into the production of extravagant and meaningless verbiage, which made it almost impossible for the writers of the eighteenth century to rise above polished platitude, and which still sickens our literature to-day, in spite of the revolution begun by Blake and Coleridge.

The literature of the Sagas is on the one hand the very flower of the mediæval, or epical feeling; and on the other it is seldom tainted by any touch of rhetoric. To tell a story as simply and as vividly as possible is its sole aim. The question it sets itself to solve is, granted certain events, What would the actors in them do and say? No detail which may help the audience to see the event is omitted, but everything is told with the least possible expense of words; and every word has a definite meaning, and no so-called synonym can supply its place.

The result of this is that the Icelandic Sagas are the best tale-telling which the world has yet seen. To speak plainly, to an unsophisticated person not prejudiced against the atmosphere of the tales, no old literature is as amusing as these ancient stories of our kinsmen of the North, and at the same time, though they sometimes necessarily give us pictures of rude and violent life, they are singularly free from anything that can be called coarseness.

The translators wish to say that what they aim at in their renderings of these excellent works, written in a tongue near akin to English, is above all things the utmost literality, without which they venture to think the translations would lose their reason for existence. At the same time they recognise the necessity of translating the Icelandic into English idiom. They are conscious also of the besetting temptation of translators of these works to render Icelandic colloquialisms by English slang, and are on their guard against the danger.

The following is a list of the principal translations which it is intended to publish:—

THE POETIC EDDA. 1 vol.
THE PROSE EDDA. 1 vol.
THE VOLSUNGA SAGA. 1 vol.†
HEIMSKRINGLA; or, Chronicles of the Kings of Norway. 3 vols.‡

BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER.

LORD BISHOP of EXETER.

The present Edition contains 600 Hymns, of which only 466 appeared in the last Edition—84 Hymns of that Edition which contained 560 having now been omitted, whilst 134 New Hymns have been added; and it is hoped that the loss of those omitted, some of which time has proved were rarely sung, will be far more than compensated by the gain of those introduced.

The new Musical Edition has been edited by CHARLES VINCENT, Mus.D. Oxon, Organist of Christ Church, Hampstead, and by D. J. WOOD, Mus.B. Oxon, Organist of Exeter Cathedral, with the counsel and assistance, throughout their laborious work, of SIR JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus.D., Professor of Music in the University of Oxford.

The "Hymnal Companion" is used in upwards of 5,000 Churches. Grants are made in special cases on the introduction of the "Hymnal Companion" into poor parishes.

LITERATURE.

The Autobiography of a Seaman. By Thomas Tenth Earl of Dundonald. With a Sequel. (Bentley.)

THE "great Lord Cochrane" is little more than a name to Englishmen of the present time. He is not associated, like Howe and Nelson, with days of the Fourth of June and the Nile; he never even commanded a British fleet, except in years of peace, and when in old age. Yet he was a real genius in naval warfare; his exploits were, of their kind, wonderful; his scientific acquirements are still of value in an age of change of tactics at sea; and though there were marked defects in his character, he did the State good service by his bold exposure of the abuses in the navy of eighty years ago. But for persecution, too, that was a public scandal, he would have been in the first rank of our admirals; and if he was long a victim of the arts of faction, his memory should now be a precious possession. The volume before us is a republication of the autobiography of this distinguished man, first given to the world about thirty years ago; and it contains a chapter on his career in exile, when under the ban of an unjust sentence, from the pen of his grandson, Lord Dundonald, which cannot fail to attract attention. The book is extremely well got up, and ought to be read with much interest. The life of Lord Cochrane is a drama as heroic as that of Drake and Raleigh; and his genius in invention may even now inspire administrators and chiefs of the British navy.

Lord Cochrane was born in 1775—a scion of a noble Scottish house, said to have descended from Norse sources, and not without distinction in our naval annals. The family, however, had dwindled away; and the father of the future warrior had been reduced to poverty, through his speculative taste for all kinds of inventions—a tendency inherited by his famous son, whose inventive faculties were of the highest order. An accident sent the lad to sea; and Cochrane, as has been the case with all who have gained renown in this noble service, worked hard when in a subordinate grade, and became a thoroughly skilful and practical seaman. These were the days of the great war with France, an era of splendid success for our fleets, which, probably, will not again occur; but Cochrane was for some time on Atlantic stations, and took no part in our first victories. He was in the Mediterranean in 1798, a junior lieutenant to Lord Keith; and he had an opportunity to exchange a few words with Nelson, then radiant with the fresh laurels of the Nile, and the rising star of our triumphant navy. The conversation made a strong impression on him; Nelson, too, appears to have been struck with the promise and the parts of the young officer; and Cochrane's remarks on our great naval hero, and on the audacious tactics that won Trafalgar—their audacity was the best proof of his genius—are striking, and of enduring interest. Lord Keith, a really good judge of men, gave Cochrane his first professional chance. He placed him in command of a tiny craft, with orders to prey on the enemy's commerce; and the exploits of the Speedy soon became the talk of Marseilles and even of Toulon. Cochrane swept from the sea the numerous coasters of the southern seaboard of France and Spain; and his skill and seamanship were such that, with a petty sloop of 158 tons and fourteen 4-pounders, he boarded and carried a Spanish frigate of thirty-two guns—a deed not surpassed by the Hawkins and the Frobishers, and a real exhibition of daring and genius. The achievements of the Speedy caused such terror that a French squadron was despatched against her. Cochrane was compelled to yield to irresistible force; and he saw the fight of Algeiras from the deck of the Desaix—his account differing in many respects from those of most English and French historians. His extraordinary success in this youthful cruise made evidently a lasting impression on his mind; and it led him to form a theory of naval warfare, not in accordance with the ideas of his time, but to which he clung through a long life, and which he illustrated with extreme brilliancy. The best way to cripple the power of France at sea was, he thought, not to fight great battles, nor even to operate in large squadrons, but to molest her coasts and seaboard with active cruisers, and so to paralyse and destroy her commerce, while a strict blockade was kept on her harbours. To annihilate her fleets, imprisoned in this way, he largely relied on means of destruction invented, for the most part, by himself; and these, on one signal occasion at least, proved to be efficacious in the highest degree.

These views were not favoured by a generation that had witnessed St. Vincent, the Nile, and Trafalgar; but, whatever may have been their intrinsic value, they gave effect to the power of British seamanship, and to the mechanical skill of Englishmen—two elements of strength in which we excelled. It should be observed, too, that, if the French coasts had been constantly watched by small quick vessels, the flotilla of Boulogne could have hardly assembled; and, in that event, England would not have been placed in a position of grave, nay of extreme, danger. Cochrane has left it on record that the descent was possible; and the glory of Trafalgar should not make us forget that Napoleon's design deceived Nelson and the Admiralty, and was well-nigh successful. Cochrane was in command of the Pallas when the war was renewed, and he carried out his ideas of naval warfare with extraordinary success and fertility of resource. Whether scouring the French coast, preying on French commerce, or making hairbreadth escapes from French cruisers, he displayed wonderful daring and skill; the injury he inflicted on the enemy was immense; and two of his actions, against a greatly superior force, were among the most brilliant of that age of glory. His most remarkable achievements in this kind of warfare were, however, seen when he was captain of the Impérieuse, and his exploits may be pronounced to be wonderful. With a single frigate he ravaged the French seaboard, and so disorganised the telegraphic service that whole squadrons were kept paralysed; and he checked the invading army along the Catalan coast, and inflicted enormous loss on the enemy, with unrivalled skill, and the most heroic daring. He was soon to assume a greater command, and to put to the test the plans he had formed for destroying the fleets of France in her harbours. His account of the attack on Allemand's squadron, in the roads of Aix, is of the highest interest, and widely different from those of most historians. There can be little doubt that his "explosive vessels"—akin to the torpedoes of the present day—and not the ordinary fireships, which did little mischief, broke the enemy's boom, and spread such terror through the French fleet that it went aground; and it is tolerably certain that had Lord Gambier attacked boldly at the proper moment he would have gained a victory as decisive as any of Nelson's. It may be said truly, therefore, that Cochrane's project and engineering of destruction had prodigious results—this was the judgment of Napoleon and of the French admiral—and, even as it was, the French squadron was completely crippled. The heroism of the Impérieuse in standing in, in order to force Gambier to make an attack, and in singly engaging three ships of the line, is another most striking feature of the day.

Cochrane proposed to destroy the French fleets in the Scheldt by means probably of the same kind; but the Admiralty did not entertain his project, and the Walcheren expedition proved a signal failure. The most brilliant of seamen had become involved in controversies and disputes which made him an object of the bitter dislike of the Government of the day, and had a disastrous result on his future career. Cochrane had an overbearing and impatient temper; he seldom got on well with superiors in command; in politics he was a decided Radical; and he was somewhat of a Don Quixote in his views and his conduct. He was no favourite with the Admiralty as he became famous; and when he entered the House of Commons as M.P. for Westminster he was known as a reformer of the extreme type, and a violent censor of naval abuses. Undoubtedly he had often right on his side. The administration of our navy in that age of privilege and Toryism was, in many respects, faulty; and Cochrane did good service in denouncing the jobbery and favouritism which was but too prevalent. But he certainly exaggerated the evils he condemned. He describes the state of the navy as bad and corrupt, and this could not have been the case; and his attacks made him a host of enemies in the Government and in his own profession. Abstractedly, he was perhaps right in charging Lord Gambier with neglect of duty—this has been the impartial judgment of history—but his attitude was ungenerous, and even vindictive. He was henceforth considered a dangerous man. Opportunities of distinguishing himself were withheld; and he was almost tabooed by his official superiors. There is no proof that the Government plotted against him; and, in fact, the charge on which he was arraigned—a fraudulent conspiracy against the Stock Exchange—was sustained by at least plausible evidence. But the Tories in power wished to run him down. Lord Ellenborough certainly strained the case against him beyond what was fair and just; and the persecution to which he was subjected was not creditable. The charge, it is now acknowledged, was a mistake all through; a grave miscarriage of justice took place, and one of England's greatest naval heroes was falsely convicted of a base crime abhorrent to his noble and manly nature.

An iniquitous sentence deprived England of the services of one of her greatest seamen. We shall not follow the career of Cochrane in exile. He organised and led the rude navies of the revolted Spanish and Portuguese colonies; and his exploits, especially with single ships, were as brilliant as those of the Impérieuse and the Pallas. As time rolled on, the wrong he had suffered began to be generally felt in England; and when the Whigs came into power, in 1831-2, he was restored to the place he had held in the navy. Yet complete reparation was long delayed; he did not regain the insignia of the Bath until he was far advanced in age; and the arrears of pay, of which he had been deprived, were not discharged until after his death. The title of Dundonald devolved on him as early as 1832; and in 1848 he obtained the command of a British fleet for the first time, when England was in profound peace. He had thus no opportunity to display his powers as chief of a large squadron in war; but his counsels and services were not the less of permanent value to the British navy. Dundonald was a man of true genius. He realised the change in naval affairs which had taken place since the great war, and he warned Englishmen that the armed marine of France was very different from what it had been in the days of the Ganteaumes and the Villeneuves. He perceived, too, that steam and iron were transforming ships, and were causing a revolution in naval tactics; and though he did not live to witness the age of ironclads—he survived until after the launch of the Gloire—the remarks he made on the future of war at sea are even now of no little value. In this respect, his inventive powers placed him in advance of the ideas of his time; and no doubt can exist that, had he lived in our day, he would have been the first of our naval tacticians. He insisted to the last on his favourite theory that England should aim, in a contest at sea, at crippling her enemy by means of cruisers, and destroying his fleets by mechanical means, these being kept blockaded in port; and he proposed a scheme of the kind in the Crimean War, which the Admiralty, however, did not accept. He passed away quietly in 1860; and history will record that he was a great man who did not wholly fulfil his mission. Cochrane was one of the most illustrious of British seamen; he was unsurpassed when commanding ships; and his theories of naval war bear the mark of genius. But he had never an opportunity to give complete proof of powers which good judges have declared place him in the very first rank of our naval worthies.

WILLIAM O'CONNOR MORRIS.

English Lyrics. By Alfred Austin. Edited by William Watson. (Macmillan.)

THE modern custom of putting together some of the best writings of a poet, and publishing them as selections, has much to recommend it. Its chief advantage is that it makes the poet known to many readers who might not otherwise have become familiar with his works. Readers, as a rule, have neither the good taste nor the patience to enjoy poetry. They take certain names on trust; and if any particular writer of verse is pronounced to be the vogue, they get up his poems, as they would rush round an exhibition of pictures, so as to be able to talk about them. If, however, they find ready to their hand some of the best of a man's work, which they cannot pass by without confessing their own dulness, they will read it and be the better for it.

Another excellent use of selections is the classification they admit of. They serve the purpose of showing a particular phase of a poet. Each of these advantages belongs to this volume of selections from the writings of Mr. Alfred Austin. It may be said, without the smallest reflection upon his merits, that Mr. Austin is not a popular poet. He has never been blown into fame by the praises of an eloquent statesman, nor has he condescended to the art of self-advertisement. Lasting fame does not come by these means; but there can be no objection to its being hastened—in the interest of the public it is well that it should be hastened—by such samples and foretastes of good things as Mr. Watson has collected in this volume.

If the chief value of Mr. Watson's good offices consists in the wider knowledge of Mr. Austin as a poet which may result from them, scarcely less important is the service he renders in pointing out the distinguishing aims and character of Mr. Austin's poems. They are essentially English. They breathe the air of English rural life, and they breathe also the fine vigorous air of English patriotism. In each respect Mr. Austin strikes a note which is peculiarly his own, though his love of "country" in the two-fold sense is the same love that Shakspeare had, and is again the same love that Tennyson has expressed in some of the noblest passages of English verse. Tennyson, however, has not put it into lyric form with as much frequency or freedom as Mr. Austin. The latter revels in rural things. He is the veritable poet of the seasons, and especially is he the laureate of the spring. But English springs and English soil are significant to him of the national life:

"Yes, this is England, frank and fair:
I tread its turf, I breathe its air,
And catch from every stalwart lung
The music of my mother tongue."

The selection Mr. Watson has made represents Mr. Austin in his characteristic dual phase. We have the praises of primroses and the praises of freedom, sung with the same heartiness, in the same exultant key; and one does not know which are best. This, in celebration of the early primroses, is certainly very lovely. It compares with nothing so well as with the exquisitely simple beauty of the flowers themselves:

"This, too, be your glory great,
Primroses, you do not wait,
As the other flowers do,
For the Spring to smile on you,
But with coming are content,
Asking no encouragement.
Ere the hardy crocus cleaves
Sunny borders 'neath the eaves,
Ere the thrush his song rehearse
Sweeter than all poets' verse,
Ere the early bleating lambs
Cling like shadows to their dams,
Ere the blackthorn breaks to white,
Snowy-hooded anchorite;
Out from every hedge you look,
You are bright by every brook,
Wearing for your sole defence
Fearlessness of innocence.
While the daffodils still waver,
Ere the jonquil gets its savour,
While the linnets yet but pair,
You are fledged, and everywhere.
Nought can daunt you, nought distress,
Neither cold nor sunlessness.
You, when Lent sleet flies apace,
Look the tempest in the face;
As descend the flakes more slow,
From your eyelids shake the snow,
And when all the clouds have flown,
Meet the sun's smile with your own.
Nothing ever makes you less
Gracious to ungraciousness.
March may bluster up and down,
Pettish April sulk and frown;
Closer to their skirts you cling,
Coaxing Winter to be Spring."

Not since Shakspeare's

"Daffodils
That come before the swallow dares, and take The winds of March with beauty" has any poet given us a more charming bit of rustic verse than this.

GEORGE COTTERELL.

Speeches Delivered in India, 1884-8. By the Marquis of Dufferin and Ava. (John Murray.)

TAKE heed, says the Arabic proverb, lest thy tongue slit thy windpipe. For many months after his arrival in India, Lord Dufferin would seem to have laid this sage counsel to heart. Describing a visit to Poona, in November, 1886, when the Viceroy had been in office for nearly two years, Lady Dufferin naively observes in her Journal: "It is almost the first time since he came to India that D. has let himself speak out." Her ladyship was referring to a speech incorrectly headed in the present collection, "reply to an address from the Poona municipality." As a matter of fact, the reply to the municipality is not here printed, though it contained at least one notable observation. Among other things, his Excellency said:

"I believe one of the greatest needs at the present moment is in some measure to relieve the pressure upon the land, which is created by the rapidity with which the agricultural population is trenching on the means of its subsistence, by finding employment for its redundant members in manufacturing, mechanical, and other cognate employments."

In a speech delivered two years later at Calcutta, the Viceroy referred at greater length to this most important question. While scouting the theory sometimes propounded, that the poorer classes in India live everywhere in a chronic state of semi-starvation, His Excellency did not hesitate to admit that in certain districts, inhabited by millions of people, "the means of sustenance provided by the soil are inadequate for the support of those who live upon it." The only remedies for this state of things, the speaker pointed out, are the expansion of manufacturing industries and emigration; and these are remedies which it is beyond the power of Government, by itself, to apply. Here we have an Indian grievance which the friends of India might espouse to some purpose, instead of preaching that democratic government is the one thing needful for the salvation of the country.

As a practical commentary on questions of the day in India, the Ex-Viceroy's public utterances are worthy of most careful study by all who are concerned in Indian politics, more especially by those who, while depending for their knowledge of the country on the testimony of others, nevertheless are often called upon to interfere in its destinies. There is hardly a single detail of Indian administration, domestic or foreign, on which Lord Dufferin has not spoken at one time or another, in spite of his conviction that as a rule it is undesirable for an Indian Viceroy to make speeches. And although on one occasion his Excellency pretended to speak, not as a viceroy, but rather as some intelligent traveller who had come to India for three months with the ingenious design of writing an encyclopædia about the government and people, the reader may detect everywhere, not only the statecraft acquired during a long and arduous service in almost every quarter of the world where British interests are implicated, but also abundant evidence of that intimate knowledge of Indian affairs which a viceroy must always possess even if he does not know how to use it. At the time of his resignation, as he reminded the talukdars of Oudh, Lord Dufferin was the oldest viceroy that had ever ruled in India; and certainly none before him could boast such a varied experience.

Besides speeches in India, the volume contains four delivered in England, including a remarkably outspoken one last year at the Mansion House. Never had Lord Dufferin allowed himself to speak more gravely on the Central Asian question:

"Any approach," he said, "of a great foreign military power towards the confines of India would entail on that country such an intolerable amount of expense, in the shape of additional fortifications and other measures of defence, as would become absolutely intolerable, and would be less preferable than any other alternative, however serious."

These are words which, though not marked by the speaker's usual felicity of diction, should never be forgotten.

STEPHEN WHEELER.

Barnstaple and the Northern Part of Devonshire during the Great Civil War, 1642-1646. By Richard W. Cotton. (Privately Printed.)

No feature of our great Civil War is more remarkable than the readiness with which the provinces and outlying districts of England responded to the pulsations or nervous discharges of the great centres of the contest. Until the present century no systematic attempt was made to illustrate the local phases of the conflict, and to show how dependent its great determining issues were on the minor events—the battles, sieges, &c., that took place in remote parts of the country. But the various societies and associations for the advance of antiquarian research now at work in almost every county in England have drawn attention to these less-known episodes in our history. Besides papers in the different Transactions, &c., independent monographs on the history of the Civil War in various localities have also been published. With all these antiquarian energies in full blast, it cannot now be argued, as it was by Mr. Merivale in his article on the "Memorials of the Civil War in the County of Devon," in the Retrospective Review (vol. xii.), that "the attempt at confining the attention to the limits of a particular district may claim the merit of originality."

Of the larger monographs dealing with the history of the Civil War in a particular district, Mr. Cotton's work on the progress of the conflict in Barnstaple and North Devon must be considered as holding a foremost place both for antiquarian research and for literary ability. The author tells us that he started with the intention of limiting its scope to Barnstaple, but was led eventually to extend it more or less to the whole of North Devon. His work proves sufficiently not only the need of the extension, but the author's ability to grapple with this larger aspect of the subject. Westward of a line drawn from Bristol through Taunton and Exeter to Plymouth, Barnstaple was in the seventeenth century, as it still continues to be, the most important centre in the West of England, both as a corporate town and as a seaport; and the record of its vicissitudes in the Civil War forms a narrative of considerable importance, not only to Devonians, but to all who are interested in the conflict. Nor are the incidents of the struggle in North Devon generally of less importance in their bearing on the final result. As Mr. Cotton observes in his preface (p. ix.):

"Two of the most graphically interesting and politically not least important battles of the whole war were fought within twenty-five miles of Barnstaple. The battle of Stratton, in which Cornishmen and Devonians were pitted against each other, resulted in the defeat of the parliamentary forces raised in Devonshire, and, by freeing Hopton's Cornish army, enabled him to combine with the Royalist main body, and thus conduced to the ascendancy which the king's cause attained in the second year of the war. The battle of Torrington, fought in this corner of Devonshire, and so lightly passed over by Clarendon, was practically fatal to the royal cause in the West—the only ground whereon at that late period of the struggle it had any chance of recovery."

No doubt all these subordinate incidents and features of the war find their due record in Mr. Gardiner's exhaustive work; but considerations of proportion and of space in a general history will always leave a margin for local antiquaries to bring together those details of the struggle which concern especially their own neighbourhood.

The narrative presented to us by Mr. Cotton is full of varied interest, which is further enhanced by a lucid arrangement of his materials, as well as by a graphic and attractive style. It not only gives a stirring account of the progress of the contest and of its vicissitudes (Barnstaple changed hands no less than four times during the struggle), but incidentally it throws no small light on the religious opinions and social usages of the people of North Devon in the seventeenth century. We are thus made aware that, excepting in cases where the rural population gravitated to the great Romanist or Royalist houses, the bulk of the people were on the side of the Parliament. This was still more the case with the small towns, which were centres of Puritan energy, both religious and political. An interesting illustration of this animus, and consequently of the prospects of the King's cause in the West of England, is furnished by the reception at South Molton of the Earl of Bath and his party to enforce the Commission of Array, September 15, 1642:

"The common sort of the towne fell in a great rage with the Maior and his company for giving licence that they should enter and swor that if they did attempt anything there or read their commission of Array, they would beate them all downe and kill them if they were all hanged for it: and thereupon betooke themselves to armes, both men, women and children, about the Crosse in the market place. I doe verily beleieve they were in number at least 1,000, some with musquets loaden, some with halberts and blacke Bills, some with clubs, some with pikes, some with dunge Evells, some with great poles; one I saw which had beat the calke (iron frame?) of a sive, and beat him outright and set him into a long staffe, the women had filled all the steps of the crosse with great stones and got up and sate on them, swearing if they did come there they would braine them. One thing which is worth the noting, a woman which is a butcher's wife came running with her lap-full of Rams hornes for to throw at them" (p. 68).

Mr. Cotton helps to explain what seems to have been even in those disturbed times an unusual exhibition of truculence by telling us that the population of the district round South Molton was "reputedly rough in character"; but with due abatement on this ground the spirit thus exemplified was manifested with less ferocity in other parts of Devon.

The above extract, which might easily be paralleled with other excerpts just as interesting, will serve to show that Mr. Cotton's work is as full of stirring incidents as it is of information. I can only regret that my space is too scanty to adduce further proofs of that fact, which those who read the book will easily verify for themselves.

His readers will also, I am certain, confirm my judgment that Mr. Cotton's book is a permanent and valuable addition to the history of his native county, by means of which he has, moreover, helped to elucidate some of the minor aspects of our great national contest. His generous enterprise in undertaking the task cannot be sufficiently commended. Nor is this by any means the whole of the debt which those who are interested in English history and antiquarian research owe to his well-directed enthusiasm. He has gathered his facts with unsparing industry from every available source. Setting aside lesser centres of information, he has examined more than 3,000 articles, tracts, MSS. in the British Museum alone, and has himself explored the scene of every battle and skirmish recorded in his narrative. In short, he has treated his subject with the minute conscientiousness becoming a historian who is also a trained antiquary. It may perhaps seem a little ungrateful, but I cannot help the wish that with these rare qualities and aptitudes Mr. Cotton may find a still larger and more important field for their exercise. More than one department of historical and antiquarian research would be immeasurably benefited by the care and industry which he has now proved that he abundantly possesses. As he has expanded his purview from the town of Barnstaple so as to include all North Devon, so it may be hoped he may see fit to extend still further his historical scope both in space and time, so as to embrace a wider area of our country and history.

JOHN OWEN.

Ancient Cures, Charms, and Usages of Ireland: Contributions to Irish Lore.
By Lady Wilde. (Ward & Downey.)

ANY book written by Lady Wilde is sure to be marked by graceful fancy, fervid eloquence, and intense love of her country. In the present work we find all these characteristics; but when one has said that, one has said most that is possible to say in its favour. It is to some extent a sequel to her former book, Ancient Legends of Ireland, and it is marked by just the same faults which deprived that publication of almost all value as a trustworthy treatise on folklore. Everything which real students most desire—mention of authorities, local touches, chronological and topographical details; anything that would render it possible to separate genuine ancient legend from modern invention or artistic embellishment—all these are either carelessly omitted or carefully suppressed.

It is most unfortunate that everyone of the writers who have dealt with Irish folk-lore should have treated it much in the same fashion. Lady Wilde only follows the example set by Crofton Croker, Lover, and the far greater Carleton. But for most of the others an excuse can be made which is not available in her case. From the novelists, pure and simple, we cannot expect scientific accuracy in dealing with legendary tales. It is quite in accordance with the fitness of things that the writer of fiction should alter and adapt to his purpose the traditions he uses; but with a professed collector of folk-lore such imaginative treatment of the old stories becomes almost a literary crime. And yet this mode of treatment seems now to be deliberately adopted and advocated by some writers. So much is this the case that in a little collection of Irish Fairy and Folk Tales, published not long ago in the Camelot Classics (a charming little book, by the way, from the purely literary point of view), the editor goes out of his way to gibe at the honest folk-lorist who tells what he has actually heard, not what he thinks he might have heard, or what he thinks his audience would like to hear. The folk-lorists are treated as mere dull, prosaic people of no account, who "tabulate their tales in forms like grocers' bills." How much better it would be, we are led to suppose, to make the rude folk-lore the foundation of a pleasant literary sketch which will interest the reader, to do like Samuel Lover and Crofton Croker, who have, forsooth, "caught the very voice of the people, the very pulse of life"! Do not the advocates of the essentially vicious method thus defended see that the result of it will be to deprive us of any real folk-lore at all? We shall have a mass of pretty tales, of weird ghost stories, of quaintly humorous anecdotes more or less based upon ancient tradition; but it will be impossible to distinguish between the various ingredients of which they are composed—to say: This represents the actual legendary lore of the Irish folk; that is the product of the literary fancy of Croker, or Lover, or Lady Wilde. That the country whose folk-lore, if honestly transcribed, might be the most valuable as well as the most beautiful of any in Europe should thus be represented by a literary sham instead of a scientific reality is a very distinct misfortune. And the pity of it is that it is now almost too late to gather up the precious treasures which the imaginative writers have despised. The old legends are dying out, or are becoming adulterated with modern invention by the country people themselves. The time for securing them in their original purity is fast slipping away; many have been already lost beyond recovery. All the more reason to make an earnest appeal for the reverent handling of those that remain. There are, I believe, at present at least three workers engaged in the task of collecting the folk tales of Ireland—Mr. Douglas Hyde, Mr. David Fitzgerald, and Mr. W. Larminie. It is to be hoped that these writers will have the courage to avoid the evil example of their predecessors in the same field; and that as a result of their labours we shall at last have a corpus of genuine and unadulterated Irish folk-lore.

The most important part of Lady Wilde's book is not, however, the section which deals with folk-lore, but that which consists of essays on Irish history and literature. It is true that, if these essays were the production of some unknown author, one would feel inclined, having noticed the intense enthusiasm and powerful rhetorical style, to dismiss the opinions advanced therein as not fit for serious consideration. But Lady Wilde is well known in England as a representative of Irish literature, and she holds a high place in the estimation of her own countrymen. It is, therefore, a matter to be deplored that she should in the present volume give us teaching on Irish matters which, when it deals with facts, is generally inaccurate; when it deals with principles, is mostly misleading. Her archaeology is crude beyond belief. The most ancient inhabitants of Ireland, she tells us, for example, were a race of pre-Adamic half-souled creatures, while the "Adamic" Kelts who succeeded them "belonged to a new creation, a higher humanity." One cannot help recommending to Lady Wilde a perusal of the valuable work on Celtic Ireland by her countrywoman, Mrs. Bryant.

Lady Wilde's references to history, even the history of her own time, are absolutely startling in their inaccuracy. She was a contemporary of the Young Ireland Party, and a valued contributor to the Nation; but it is almost inconceivable that anyone who knew the men who made that movement should describe Gavan Duffy as its Vergniaud, Meagher as its St. Just. To make any comparison between the French and Irish leaders more contrary to fact than these may seem difficult; but Lady Wilde is quite equal to the feat. It is actually enough to take away one's breath to find Isaac Butt—Butt at that time the Tory newspaper editor, the formal leader of the anti-national party in the Dublin corporation—described as the "Mirabeau of the Young Ireland Party."

The archaeology, history, and literary criticism in this volume are subordinate to a theory of nationality which is the keynote of the whole book. We find it in the studied antithesis between the Celt and the Saxon, the contrast between the Irish and English peoples, which is repeated in various forms in almost every page. An honest contrast of the characteristics of two nations in which justice is done to the merits and defects of both may be of great value. Sir Mountstuart Grant-Duff has well said that the publication of Mr. Hamerton's French and English amounted to a real political good action. But there is another kind of contrast which is the opposite of a good action, whether political or otherwise. How familiar are Irishmen with the young orator who treats us to endless variations on the theme of "Erin and Virtue"—Erin and courage, intellect, art, religion, and everything else that is good; "the Saxon and Guilt"—greed, stupidity, mammon-worship, and every other imaginable form of vice. The "anti-Irish Irishman" is bad enough, but surely he is not so entirely irritating as this foolish creature! And the countenance which Lady Wilde gives to such rhodomontade is not likely to abate the nuisance. The "stolid Saxons" (the collocation is almost as familiar as the "well-greaved Achaeans"), with their "plethoric prosperity and self-centered egotism" are "apathetic and dull-brained." "It is evident that nature made them for a destiny of inferiority—for a servile race." Their religion is "without art or beauty, or ritual, or symbol, or reverence"; but for that very reason it is, of course, all the more "suited to the dogged self-asserting egotism of the English." With them "self is the only motive power; greed of land, greed of wealth, the only aim; the lust of gold everywhere, the love of God nowhere." The Celts, on the other hand, are "made for warriors and orators"; they are "made for religion and art." "Nationality, this dream of an ideal future, illumines their poetry and oratory, their music and song, with a vague splendour of passion and pathos." "They live on dreams and prayers." "The Celt is the artist and poet of the world."

Lady Wilde has certainly a great gift of rhetoric, and "the number of adjectives she knows" is almost appalling to the ordinary person; but what on earth does all this eloquence mean? To say that the average Irish peasant has a more poetic nature than the ordinary English yokel is an absolute truism to any who have known both Pat and Hodge. To say that a nation which has produced the greatest poets of the world is essentially unpoetic, while a country which has had in historic times hardly any poet who stands high even in the second rank is pre-eminently a nation of poets—such judgment as this is so obvious a contradiction of truth that it does not even assume the merits of a paradox. If the comparison of the whole body of English literature with that of Ireland be thought unfair, take the writers of both countries at the present time. Perhaps the Irish man of letters best known in England nowadays is Mr. Justin McCarthy. He is not remarkable for any prejudice against his own country. What does he say on this matter? He tells us in a recent article that among Celtic Irishmen there is at the present time no one who is in the first class as poet, novelist, dramatist, or musician. But it is very easy on this point to refute Lady Wilde out of her mouth. When making such very strong statements as those mentioned above, she would have been wiser if she had contented herself with these glowing but vague generalisations and avoided particular instances. Unfortunately for her own position, she does give specific examples of the height to which Celtic genius soars at the present day. Dr. J. F. Waller, she tell us, is "the sweetest living lyrist of Ireland"; Mr. T. D. Sullivan is "the most ardent and powerful of living Irish poets." To one who looks at such matters as an ordinary critic, dispensing with the aid of patriotic green spectacles, Dr. Waller appears as a melodious versifier of something more than average ability, Mr. T. D. Sullivan as a spirited singer of rattling ballads, humorous and effective political squibs. To describe these two gentlemen as the greatest of Irish poets is to make a plain confession that the nation of poets is in poetry infinitely inferior to the dull-brained, prosaic, "stolid Saxon." It is to be hoped, however, that very few critics would accept this singular selection of the representative poets of a country which has but recently lost Ferguson and Allingham, and which still can show (not to speak of others) Aubrey de Vere. Indeed, one "Speranza," of whom Lady Wilde possibly has heard, would be considered by many to rank distinctly higher among contemporary Irish writers of verse than either of those whom she has singled out for admiration. Not only is the relative position which Lady Wilde ascribes to the two races incorrect, if tried by the test of present writers, but it is in some ways curiously the reverse of true. Among Irish writers it is the Protestant Anglo-Irishmen, not the Catholic

Celts, who take the first place in intellect, as Mr. McCarthy—himself a Catholic and a Celt—with admirable candour points out. And it is not in the domains in which the imagination is supreme—in fiction, music, and song—that Irishmen just now excel; but in the more prosaic fields of history and criticism. Mr. Lecky stands in the first rank of historians; Mr. Stopford Brooke and Prof. Dowden are the first among those who write the history of English literature. Some sayings of the latter of these on the subject under discussion seem to me full of wise teaching for many impulsive young Irishmen, who do not need to imitate the petition of their Scotch brother that Providence would send him a good conceit of himself. Prof. Dowden quotes from a popular Irish biography a passage (much in the style of Lady Wilde, by the way) which concludes, "Not even Greece, prolific as she was in sages and heroes, can boast such a lengthy bead-roll as Ireland can of names worthy of the immortality of history," and comments upon it thus:—

"We should be far better patriots if, instead of singing paeans about Irish genius, we were to set ourselves to correct some of the defects of Irish intellect. Let an Irish poet teach his countrymen to write a song free from rhetoric, free from false imagery, free from tinsel, and with thoroughly sound workmanship in the matter of verse, and he will have done a good and a needful thing. . . . We cannot create a school of Irish men of genius—poets are born, not made—but what we can do is this: we can try to secure for Ireland the advantage of possessing a school of honest and skilled craftsmen in literature. But of this school of craftsmen now and again a man of genius may arise strong and sane because he has sprung from a race of intelligent and patient workmen and because he feels their influence surrounding him."

The bane of criticism in things Irish has mostly been that it has been founded not on intrinsic merit but on racial, religious, or political considerations. Irish critics have been apt to ask concerning a writer "Is he English or Irish? Is he Celtic or Saxon? Is he Catholic or Protestant? Is he Nationalist or West Briton," not "Is he an honest, good, and true workman?" Sir C. Gavan Duffy tells somewhere of an Irish reporter who was asked how it was he always managed to give the exact numbers of the persons present at large meetings. His method was the simplest thing in the world: he used to give a rough guess at the number round him; if they were his opponents he divided his estimate by four; if friends, he multiplied it by ten. A somewhat similar manner of computation has not been unfrequent with Irish critics in estimating the merits of friends and foes. The mention of Sir C. Gavan Duffy, however, reminds one that the charge of unfaithful criticism could not have been made against the brilliant band of Young Irelanders, of which he is the most distinguished survivor. To take one instance out of many, that John Mitchel should have reviewed Carlyle's "Cromwell" in the Nation in such a manner as to draw praises from the author, who was of all men most difficult to please, is a fact which speaks volumes for the absolute fairness of the Young Ireland Party. They were said to have "brought back a soul into Ireland." They certainly did produce not only a revival of Irish patriotic feeling but a renaissance of Irish literature. They were rigidly just, if not unduly severe, in criticising the literary shortcomings of their own party, and they set an example of candour and courtesy in their estimates of opponents. It is a saddening thing that we seem to have fallen far below their standard. To restore it should be the aim of any Irishman who wishes that his opinion on Irish literature should be worth the paper it is written on.

NEW NOVELS.

The Criton Hunt Mystery. By Mrs. Robert Jocelyn. In 3 vols. (Hurst & Blackett.)

Sapphira. By Sarah Tytler. In 2 vols. (Ward & Downey.)

Jabez Easterbrook. By Joseph Hocking. (Ward, Lock & Co.)

Perfervid. By John Davidson. (Ward & Downey.)

The Gentleman who Vanished. By Fergus Hume. (White.)

In Crime's Disguise. By F. C. Milford. (Trischler.)

Dr. Rollison's Dilemma. By L. E. Tideman. (Simpkin, Marshall & Co.)

The Witness Box. By Veva and Collis Karsland. (Trischler.)

THERE is a good deal of hunt and but little mystery in Mrs. Jocelyn's new story. But the mystery is on the whole the more enjoyable element in it. Two spirited young girls, Lady Helen and Lady Marcia Criton, have each a fortune of £700,000, and have the conventional prettiness to be found in novels; thus the younger has "a soft peachy skin, very fair, fluffy hair, large blue eyes, nez retroussé, and a mouth that was perfect in repose, and still more perfect when smiling, and surrounded by curving little dimples." Partly owing to family troubles and quarrels, and partly in a spirit of fun and a desire for adventure, the girls, on the initiative of Helen, the elder, transform themselves into the Misses Jones, and adopt, as their step-mother their maid, Mrs. Jones, who has a weakness for dropping both her "h's" and "my lady" at the most inconvenient moments. They have much difficulty, but also get much amusement, in coaching Mrs. Jones in her part. To make matters worse, they set up their establishment, which is one of a very "sporting" and comfortable sort, in the neighbourhood of their cousins, Lord Clarenby, and his brother Robert Criton. It is quite unnecessary to say that the two young men fall in love with the two young women, although it may be necessary to add that they do not prosper equally well in courtship. Helen and Marcia hide a good number of things, but they cannot conceal from their cousins' mother the resemblance of their voices to that of her daughter. So the games of cross-purposes in this book are practically innumerable, but they are played out carefully to the end. It almost goes without saying that horses—and one wild horse in particular—occupy prominent positions in The Criton Hunt Mystery. Ordinary readers who think that ample justice has already been done to hunting and its accompaniments in fiction will perhaps wish that there had been less about them in Mrs. Jocelyn's new story. In that case, it might easily have been kept to two-thirds of its present dimensions. But it is a wholesome, enjoyable, well-written novel all the same.

Sapphira is one of the weakest novels its author has written; and the leading incident in it, the flight of a family to France, owing to the misdeeds of one of the parents, recalls Mrs. Oliphant's short story, The Fugitives. After all, there is no sufficient reason why poor Mrs. Baldwin should be nicknamed Sapphira, since, though she does conceal the manner in which her husband died, she gains nothing by her deceit. The characters of the young Baldwins—Agnes, with her over intense feelings and her literary ambitions, the more practical and girlish Georgie, and their brother Pat, the doctor—are sufficiently well sketched and act admirably as foils to each other. Yet the marriages which are dashed off at the end, especially that of Agnes, spoil the effect of the story, which seems to have been far too hurriedly written.

There is a superabundance of Meredithian cleverness—of the cleverness of Mr. Meredith when in his Shaving of Shagpat mood—in Mr. Davidson's extravaganza of Perfervid; but it gives no evidence of its author's capacity to write such a book as Richard Fevrel or even Evan Harrington. There is a method, and even a little philosophy, in the fooling of Ninian Jamieson and his clown and tool Cosmo Mortimer; and some of the scenes are high-class farce. There is besides something more than a touch of pathos in the action of Marjorie Morton, who unites her fortunes to those of Ninian when he has lost his provostship, is bankrupt, and is reduced from his dreams of royalty to keeping a grocer's shop. The second story in Mr. Davidson's volume, The Pilgrimage of Strong soul and Sauders Elshander, is the better, more natural, and more intelligible of the two. The playing of the two boys at "The Pilgrim's Progress" reminds one not a little of Mr. George MacDonald. But Mr. Davidson's humour is far richer and more refined than Mr. MacDonald's, and he has indisputably the gift of style. It is plain that the author of Perfervid is a man of great and varied capacity, and that he has read and reflected infinitely more than the majority of writers of fiction, even of fiction that is a good deal better than the common. But he must beware lest he cultivate the fantastic to the prejudice of the real.

Undoubtedly Jabez Easterbrook is what it professes to be, "a religious novel." But it is much more; it is a story of a wide human interest and strong human passion. Jabez Easterbrook settles in the village of Heathertown as Wesleyan minister. He "was intelligent yet bigoted, sympathetic yet narrow; while the people among whom he had come to labour were rugged yet honest, settled in their opinions, but at the same time possessed of a large amount of common sense." He is introduced to Margaret Ashton, the daughter of the leading member of his congregation—a girl who, although only nineteen, has read Darwin, Comte, Emerson, and Spinoza, and whose creed is, therefore, very unlike Easterbrook's. The two influence each other's faith, and are, of course, ultimately married. Easterbrook has difficulties of various kinds to contend with. He has to vindicate his physical no less than his intellectual superiority over the rough natures he is thrown among. He outgrows his faith, and has to resign his pastorate in consequence; finally he starts a Free Church of his own. Although it is not based on Robert Elsmere, and can hardly be said even to suggest that work, Jabez Easterbrook is well and earnestly written, and is far above the average of the class of fiction to which it ostensibly belongs.

It is evident from The Gentleman who Vanished that Mr. Fergus Hume ought, as a novelist in search of characters, to leave this country and return to Australia. There is nothing specially original or very attractive about the plot of this story. Young men who have got into trouble have ere now sold themselves to the Devil; and this is in effect what Adrian Lancaster does when, having apparently murdered Philip Trevanna with a decanter containing such brandy as he has not himself consumed, he exchanges bodies with that wicked old scoundrel Dr. Michael Roversmire. It was a very foolish and quite unnecessary step for Lancaster to take, since, of course, Trevanna is not murdered. It seems strange, too, that he did not at a much earlier period in the story think of his final escape from his quandary, by committing suicide as Roversmire, and coming back to life and Olive Maunders. Altogether, the farcical bulks much more largely than the true supernatural in The Gentleman who Vanished; and the improbability of the story is not sufficiently relieved even by the man-of-the-worldly sagacity of Teddy Rudall, and the treachery and bad spelling of Roversmire's servant, Dentham.

In Crime's Disguise is well stocked with Irish crime, murder, personal revenge, dramatic success, and exciting passages of all kinds; and yet at the last we find ourselves, "on a glorious Italian morning, in that smartest of schooners, the Almira, ramping along through the clear waters of the Mediterranean," while

"William Escott, leaning on the weather-rail, is greedily drinking in the glorious, invigorating, ozone-laden air, and feasting his eyes on the ever-changing beauties of the scene around, while beside him stands Cecil Ravenscourt, eyeing him with the sort of gratification you may see on the features of a hospitable host as he notes his favoured guest's appreciation of '74 Perrier Jouet.'"

There is a melodramatic full-bloodedness about both the crime and the love of In Crime's Disguise—it takes a page to describe one or two of the charms of Lucy Escott—which will no doubt secure for it a reading constituency. The plot by which Wilfrid Sullivan is converted first into William Ffrench and then into William Escott is well constructed; and there could hardly be two more thorough-paced scoundrels, even of the Irish-American breed, than Thomas Atherton and John Washington Simmonds. Yet one sighs for a little open air, and sunshine, and rest, after so much blood, blue fire, and strain. This, however, the author does not even attempt to supply.

The heroine of Mr. Tiddemann's more than sufficiently sensational story looks like an old acquaintance. Surely this is not the first time that one has come across a charming and loveable wife, who is used as a decoy by an unscrupulous scoundrel of a husband. Lois, the victim of Carlo Almieri, is certainly neither prettier, nor better, than most of her class. She is undoubtedly, however, placed in specially difficult and compromising situations. She is perpetually thrown into the company of a man who is her all too chivalrous lover, and with whom her husband would be only too glad if she would hopelessly entangle herself. It is rather singular, however, that such an accomplished and wideawake villain as Almieri does not make an earlier discovery of and swoop down upon his wife's second, more passionate, and perhaps, therefore, more successful lover, who has the great advantage of being, against his will, her medical attendant. All turns out well, indeed; for Henderson, the more pure minded of Lois's admirers, conveniently pistols her husband and then dies himself. The plot, though in some respects conventional, is yet coherent throughout. Old Mrs. Askew, who looks after the household and the virtue of her medical master—and seems to have enough to do—is a very good and consistent sketch. The Traitor Doubt, which is included in the same volume as Dr. Rollison's Dilemma, is rather weak, confused, and unsatisfactory.

The Witness Box is, as its name and the sensational picture on the title-page sufficiently indicate, a detective story, written in the style, and with a good deal of the special power, of Mr. Fergus Hume. The central incident, however, has the merit (?) of originality. The murder of Mr. A. B. C. in the railway carriage is committed not by any of the reasonably "likely" persons who are arrested or shadowed in connexion with it, but by the detective who is afterwards engaged in tracing the crime home to its perpetrator. It will be hardly possible to improve on this idea, unless, indeed, by causing a particular murder to be committed by the judge or the foreman of the jury engaged in a trial of an innocent man overwhelmed by circumstantial evidence. Even Duncan Knabb is only exposed through the practically supernatural agency of the phonograph. There is an abundance of stir in the book, for every one in it, from the detective upwards, has at least one love affair on hand. All, however, ends in match-making and babies. Apart from the detective business, The Witness Box is a decidedly commonplace story of the "bread-and-cheese-and-kisses" order, in spite of the romance of Hugh Merton and Nita Beringer. But the commonplace is good.

WILLIAM WALLACE.

SOME VOLUMES OF GERMAN NEW TESTAMENT CRITICISM.

Der erste Brief Paulian Timotheus. Auf's Neue untersucht und ausgelegt von Heinrich Koelling. Zwei Theile. (Berlin: Rother. London: Kegan Paul & Co.) The authenticity of the Epistles to Timothy and Titus was first impugned by Schleiermacher in his Kritisches Sendschreiben (1807). Critical scholars like Baur, Hilgenfeld, and Credner followed the line of argument laid down in that work and accepted the conclusions at which its author had arrived. The two chief objections to the Pauline origin of these Epistles—that their diction is different from that of the undoubtedly authentic books of the Apostle; and that there is no time in the life of St. Paul, as recorded in the Acts, into which the Epistles seem to fit—have been brought forward with great learning and ability in the latest commentary (1880) by Prof. Holtzmann. The author has in the book before us, the second part of which has recently appeared, examined these objections with equal industry and acumen, and, while admitting their partial truth, he has drawn from them just the opposite conclusion—in favour of the authenticity of the Pastoral Epistles. The student who peruses both works will be fully acquainted with all the arguments urged on either side in this controversy. In a very instructive table (p. 59), the author shows that, of the 1959 ἄρτι λεγόμενα found in the New Testament, the largest percentage belongs to the 2 Epistle of St. Peter, the Pastoral Epistles, and St. Jude; that Philippians and Colossians are richer in terms occurring only once than 1 Corinthians and Romans; and these again richer than Thessalonians and Galatians. Pastor Koelling agrees with Dr. Holtzmann that 1 Timothy has about seventy-four words peculiar to itself. It is not the number, however—as he justly remarks—but the quality of the terms which must be taken into account. The use of words common among profane authors like αἰδώς, καταλέγω, ἀνδροφόνος, διατροφή, &c., in this Epistle may be merely accidental (pp. 66-78). Of the others, a considerable number are general, technical, and scientific terms, like ἀντίδοσις, ἀπείραντος, ἐντρέφω, μετάληψις, πρόκριμα, all but twelve occurring in Plato. Among these latter we find words characteristic of the Apostle, like ἀντιλutron ii. 6—διαλογος iii. 8—ἐδραϊώμα v. 10—ὑπερπελεονδίζω i. 14. The language which men of culture and learning employ among each other has many terms and idioms of its own, as the author aptly remarks (pp. 44 sq.); and Schleiermacher himself used quite a different style when he addressed de Wette or Friedrich von Raumer than when he wrote to his wife or Eleonore G. In the same way the Apostle made use more frequently of scientific expressions in the Epistles to Timothy and Titus than in those sent to the large congregations of Corinth and Rome. It would not, however, be possible to infer from the latter Epistles that their author was ignorant of the use of such terms. In Romans we find χρησις—πλάσμα—χηματισμός; in Corinthians σύμφωνος and διαίρεσις. Nor can there be any doubt that St. Paul obtained that learning, when a youth, at Tarsus, which was at his time (cf. Strabo, 14, 672 sq.), together with Athens and Alexandria, one of the great seats of letters and philosophy, and from which went forth grammarians like Protagoras, who is mentioned in Plutarch's table-talk, and rhetoricians like Apollonius of Tyana. As to the time at which the Epistles were written, the author maintains (p. 226 sq.) that they must have been despatched in the spring of the year 57 A.D. The Apostle, after his long stay at Ephesus, purposed, on his third journey, to travel through Macedonia and Achaia (Acts xix. 21, 22), and he sent Timotheus and Erastus in advance (cf. 1 Cor. iv. 17 and 19): "I sent Timothy, my beloved child," and "I will come soon myself." The news, however, which St. Paul received of the dissensions at Corinth induced him to change his plans and to visit that city sooner than he had intended. This change of plans accounts for the length of the instructions given in the Epistles, which seems excessive, considering the short time that Timothy was absent. The main objection to this theory is that offered by 1 Tim. i. 3; and Otto's interpretation of this passage, which is adopted by the author—according to which Paul remained at Ephesus, and Timothy journeyed to Macedonia—does not appear to us convincing. The third part of Volume I., which deals with the traditions of the Pastoral Epistles found in the documents of the Early Church, is not equal to the first two parts. It would have been of great interest to compare the language of the Epistles to Timothy with that of the early Fathers, with Clement and Barnabas, and the Apostles' Teaching. As regards i. 9, "the law is not made for the righteous," we do not agree with the author (vol. ii. p. 36), that St. Paul referred to the Decalogue; he evidently used the term "law" in the universal and generic sense. On the whole, Pastor Koelling's commentary is a thoroughly able and exhaustive reply on behalf of the conservative school to the attack which has been made from the liberal side on the authenticity of the Pastoral Epistles.

Der Galaterbrief nach seiner Echtheit. Untersucht von Rudolf Steck. (Berlin: Reimer; London: Kegan Paul & Co.) All schools of theological thought have agreed in regarding as almost an offence any attempt at impugning the authenticity of the first four Pauline Epistles. And the author, as appears from the introduction to his work, is conscious that he will not altogether escape that censure which Bruno Bauer and lately A. Loman have incurred when arguing that the Epistles to the Romans, Corinthians, and Galatians are spurious documents, dating from the second century. It is with evident reluctance that Prof. Steck publishes the results to which his investigations have led him; and, considerable as is the learning which he exhibits, few scholars will, we believe, be reconciled to a book which to them must appear to run counter to the ordinarily received laws of historical criticism. It cannot be said that the work, thorough as it is, contains anything new, or that its statements derive especial force from the manner in which they are brought forward. The arguments by which the author endeavours to show that the earliest writing which quotes Pauline Epistles, the first Epistle of Clement—a letter sent by the Church of Rome to the Church of Corinth during the reign of Domitian—was composed as late as 140 A.D. (pp. 294-308) will hardly appear convincing; still less his assertion (pp. 308 sq.) that the Epistle of Clement must have followed the Epistles to the Corinthians within a few years, because they both deal with exactly the same questions, and show that the state of affairs had not changed in the Greek city during the time that these various letters were written. But the Pauline Epistles evidently refer to factions which arose immediately after the founding of the Church at Corinth; cf. 1 Cor. iii. 6: "I planted, Apollos watered; but God gave the increase." Again, verse 10: "As a wise master builder I laid a foundation." Further, iii. 1: "As babes in Christ I fed you with milk." Clement, on the other hand, rebukes the younger members of the congregation for their want of obedience to their elders (chap. xlvii.).

"Formerly," he says, "ye were subject to those that presided over you (i.); now the foolish have risen against the wise, and the young men against the elders (iii.). The apostles ordained throughout the cities in which they preached bishops and deacons (xlii.), and happy are the elders (bishops) who have completed their life's journey; for they need fear no more, being removed from their rightful place by young men (xlv.)."

It is certain that those who had heard the "Epistle of the blessed Saul" (xlvii.) had passed away; and that the lifetime of one generation intervened between the Epistles of Paul and the Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians. Equally unsatisfactory is the manner in which the questions connected with the canon of Marcion are treated. The ingenious heretic who first conceived the idea of forming a New Testament by collecting the writings of the Apostles admitted into his volume the Gospel according to St. Luke and ten Epistles of St. Paul. First among these he placed Galatians; and he rejected Timothy and Titus. Marcion arrived at Rome about 140 A.D. Having assigned Galatians to that date, Prof. Steck is obliged to place Timothy and Titus at a time after Marcion; and according to him, Tertullian made the ludicrous mistake of taunting the heretic (adv. Marc. v. 21) with the rejection of two Epistles which had not been written when he lived! The further questions—as to how Marcion could possibly mistake for genuine Ephesians, composed according to the author's theory during the very year that he was making his canon; and, again, whether he did not receive the writings of which it consisted, at least some of them, from his teacher Cerdon, who flourished 130-140—are not even touched upon. That St. Paul refers to the words of Jesus, and sometimes repeats the expressions which his Lord had used, is evident from passages like Rom. xiii. 8-10; 1 Cor. vii. 10; xiii. 2 ("removing of mountains"). But the whole problem whether he obtained his information from oral tradition, or from memoirs other than our canonical Gospels, is settled by the remark (p. 168) that Corinthians drew upon Matthew and Luke, and is consequently later than the Synoptists, which themselves date from the commencement of the second century. Altogether the work of Prof. Steck will not, we believe, alter the opinion which the various schools of theological thought have formed on the origin of the four chief Epistles of the New Testament.

Die Geschichte der Auferweckung des Lazarus. Von F. L. Steimmeyer. (Berlin: Wiegandt und Grieben; London: Kegan Paul & Co.) This is the third of a series of contributions which the author is making to the elucidation of the most important chapters of the Gospel according to St. John. The first two books on the high-priestly prayer (chap. xvii.) and on the conversation with the Samaritan woman were noticed in the ACADEMY, May 19 and August 5, 1888; and the next number of the series will treat of the interview with Nicodemus. The present book possesses all the merits which we noticed in the earlier parts—grace and clearness of style, as well as great dexterity in the treatment of the details of the story. All the various points which are brought out in the course of the investigation are summarised under one leading thought. The purpose which St. John had before his mind when he narrated the resurrection of Lazarus, and which, "like a beacon-light, shines through darkness"—as the author puts it (p. 24)—"was to record an event in which, through the sickness and death of man, the glory of God was revealed by Him who is the resurrection and the life to them that believe." The greatest miracle which Jesus performed must be regarded under a threefold aspect—as the work of a friend, as the deed of the Son, and as an heritage left to all the faithful. As at Nain, sympathy with the widow whose only son was carried to the grave, so here at Bethany, "human love" to the brother of Martha and Mary was the motive of the act. The difficulty of bringing the account of these acts, or of the whole course of events previous to the Passion Week given by the Synoptists, into agreement with that offered by St. John is by no means underrated by the author. He justly discards the explanations offered by apologetic writers, who endeavour to harmonise the two accounts by saying that St. Matthew and St. Luke restricted themselves in their biographies of Jesus to the north country of Galilee, and that they omitted a miracle which was wrought in the immediate vicinity of Jerusalem; or else—as Hengstenberg maintained—that they agreed to leave the record of a deed which revealed the very depths of divine love and power to the disciple who had reclined on Jesus's bosom. He points out all the bearings which, according to St. John, the events of Bethany had on those at Jerusalem; the deliberations of "the chief priests and Pharisees in council," as well as the rejoicings of the crowd on "Palm Sunday," were the immediate consequences of the former; and the death of Jesus seems to follow in a natural manner the resurrection of Lazarus. Quite different, according to St. Matthew xvii. 6 sq. and St. Mark xiv. 3 sq., is the connexion between the supper in the house of Simon the leper in Bethany and the council of the chief priests at Jerusalem. It was the aim of St. John, so the author states, to show in his Gospel the dual action of the principles of light and darkness; as in chaps. v. and ix., so here, a work of love, a revelation of light, is immediately followed by an ebullition of hatred, a manifestation of darkness. Dr. Steinmeyer goes, however, too far, when, in his endeavour to display the greatness of that work, he compares the motive on the part of the Father in raising the Son to the motive of the Son in raising Lazarus. Again, the small family consisting of a brother and two sisters, whose hospitable roof had so often given shelter to Jesus, can hardly be called a "type of the brotherhood of the Church" here on earth.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MESSRS. ISBISTER & Co. will publish in November a volume containing the series of Old Testament studies which Mr. Gladstone has been contributing to Good Words under the title "The Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture."

ONE of the events of the publishing season will be a new drama by Henrik Ibsen, who has given to Mr. Edmund Gosse his entire English and American rights. Mr. William Heinemann has made arrangements with Mr. Gosse to issue an English version in London on the day that the original appears in Copenhagen.

MR. WILLIAM HEINEMANN will publish in November a short story by Count Tolstoi, dealing with the early Christians and drawing a parallel between Pagan and Christian marriages. The English title will be "Work while ye have the Light," and the Russian original is said to have been suppressed by the censor prior to publication.

MESSRS. EYRE & SPOTTISWOODE will shortly publish a Glossary of Bible Words, by the Rev. A. L. Mayhew, with illustrative passages, selected as far as possible from the earlier English Versions of the Bible, with the purpose of indicating the source of the Biblical expressions found in the Authorised Version.

Five Years with the Congo Cannibals, the publication of which, by special arrangement with Mr. H. M. Stanley is delayed until October 15, is the first attempt at describing the domestic and daily life of the savages of the far interior of Western Equatorial Africa. The work is the result of five years spent in their midst by Mr. Herbert Ward, one of the survivors of Stanley's ill-fated rear guard, who had previously been in the service of the Congo State from 1884 to 1887. The numerous illustrations are reproduced from Mr. Ward's own drawings and photographs. The book will be published by Messrs. Chatto & Windus.

WE hear that Mr. H. B. Wheatley's new edition of Cunningham's Handbook of London will be published by Mr. John Murray in October. The late Thomas Thorne did a good deal of work at the book, but left it unfinished at his death. The index will contain nearly ten thousand entries.

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN will shortly publish in the Cameo Series a volume of Lyrics, by Mme. Darmesteter (Mary Robinson), containing selections from her previous works, as well as some new poems.

THE Collectanea Cornubiensia, by George Clement Boase, one of the joint-authors of the Bibliotheca Cornubiensis, is now in the hands of the binder. This work contains biographical and topographical notes relating to Cornwall, the biographical notes referring to many families, forming complete pedigrees. In the volume are also given copies of two MSS., with illustrative notes: 1. "The Journal of the Mayor of Penzance, 1816-1817," a curious document, illustrating the state of society at that period; 2. "The Journal of Mr. Richard Edmond's when taking his Sons to the College of St. Pol de Léon," an account of a place where many Cornish boys were educated. The impression of the Collectanea is limited to one hundred and thirty copies, being chiefly intended for persons interested in the western county.

MESSRS. SWAN SONNENSCHN & Co. will publish shortly, in their "Social Science Series," a description of the New York State Reformatory at Elmira, by Mr. Alexander Winter. The book will describe the life at the reformatory, and the methods employed in this interesting sociological experiment, which endeavours to translate into practice the most advanced penological theories of the day. Mr. Havelock Ellis is writing a preface to the book.

THE publication of London City will be slightly delayed, owing to the artist, Mr. William Luker, having increased the number of illustrations from the 250 promised in the prospectus to nearly 300. Among them will be a drawing of the old garden at the back of No. 4, Crosby-square, notable for its fine trees and fountain.

Through Magic Glasses is the title of a new work from the pen of Arabella B. Buckley (Mrs. Fisher), which Mr. Stanford has nearly ready for publication. It will be a sequel to the same author's "Fairland of Science," now in its twenty-third thousand, and will have numerous illustrations.

A NEW edition of A Mariage de Convenance will appear immediately in Mr. T. Fisher Unwin's "Novel Series." The same publisher will produce shortly Everyday Miracles, by Bedford Pollard. The common objects of the world are glorified in this book by the light of science, but without technical phraseology.

ANOTHER reply to Prof. Drummond's Spiritual Law in the Natural World, by Mr. Edmund Swift, is announced for immediate publication by Mr. Elliot Stock.

MESSRS. BICKERS & SON will publish shortly: True Catholicity, or, Cramped Conformity? a few Thoughts and Suggestions for Members of the Anglican Communion, by the Rev. Georges Venables; The Autocrat in the Green Room: with a Play after "Othello," by William Spink; A Play and XV. Sonnets, by Geo. Herbert Kersley; Sacred and Shaksperian Affinities: being Analogies between the Writings of the Psalmist and of Shakspeare, by Charles Alfred Swinburne.

THE Rev. A. R. Maddison, one of the Priest-Vicars of Lincoln Minster, is just going to print the second volume of his Calendar of Wills in the Lincoln District Probate Registry. It will run from 1600 to 1617 A.D.

A TABLET with the following inscription has been placed on the wall of the little church of Llantysilio, near Llangollen:—"In memory of Robert Browning, poet, born 1812, died 1889, who worshipped in this church ten weeks in autumn, 1886; by his friend, Helen Faucit Martin."

IN the Saturday and Sunday issues of the Journal des Débats are appearing a series of essays by M. Paul Desjardins, entitled "Les Campagnons de la Vie Nouvelle." The first and second of these dealt with Mme. James Darmesteter (Mary Robinson). The collections of her poems entitled "An Italian Garden" and "The New Arcadia" are criticised with enthusiasm. The writer concludes:

"Son rêve est donc un rêve de pleine santé de personne parfaitement lucide. Là, au fond d'elle-même, où nous avons enfin pénétré, règne en effet, l'harmonie, l'assurance, prête à agir, et le courage. Nous avons retrouvé la vaillante petite abeille d'Attique ou de Florence."

M. Desjardins's last critique was on the poetry and personality of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Browning.

IN the Theologische Jahresbericht for 1889 there is an analysis of Prof. Max Müller's first volume of Gifford Lectures. It is said to be the object of these lectures to show how the deities of the "shadow" and the storm-wind are gradually developed into supreme deities. Can "shadow" be meant as a translation of "sky," and can "sky" have been derived from skai?

FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

AMONG the contents of the forthcoming number of Mind (completing its fifteenth year) will be articles by Mr. Herbert Spencer on the "Origin of Music," in reply to Darwin and the late Edmund Gurney; and by Mr. James Sully on "Mental Elaboration."

THE forthcoming number of the Asiatic Quarterly Review will contain—in addition to the articles mentioned in the ACADEMY of last week—an examination of "The Conception of a Future Life among the Semitic Races," by Prof. E. Montet, of Geneva, in which he concludes in favour of a Greek origin for this belief; also "China: Its Social Organisation and State Economy," by General Tsheng-ki-tong; "The Rise and Fall of the Arab Dominion," by Prof. H. A. Salmoné; "The Non-Christian View of Missionary Failure," by a veteran missionary, who speaks in turn through the mouths of a Muhammadan, a Hindu, and a Buddhist; and "Child Marriage and Enforced Widowhood in India," by a Brahman official, protesting against the recent agitation

"to remove the Himalaya of Hindu society into the British channel by such legislation as raising the age for the legal protection of women by one year, or presuming that husbands who leave property by will to their widows do so on the understanding that they will re-marry."

THE October number of the English Illustrated Magazine, commencing the eighth volume, opens with a long poem by Mr. Swinburne, entitled "An Autumn Vision." The frontispiece is a wood-engraving, by H. Gedon, of Bellini's portrait of the Doge Loredano in the National Gallery. Among the other contents are—"The Vicar of Wakefield and its Illustrators," by Mr. Austin Dobson; "Edinburgh," by Mrs. Oliphant, illustrated by Mr. George Reid; "In New Guinea," by Mr. Hume Nisbet, with illustrations by the author; and a series of portraits of trade-union leaders.

THE October number of Atalanta (Trischler)—which begins the fourth year of that magazine—will contain the first chapters of a serial by Mrs. Molesworth, entitled "Imogen"; a complete short story by Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett; and the first of two illustrated papers on "The Work of Burne Jones," by Miss Julia Cartwright. The special subject of the Scholarship and Reading Union for the year is "Shakespeare," for which Prof. Edward Dowden has drawn up a programme.

AMONG the contents of the October number of Igdrasil, which begins a second volume, will be "The Last Laird of Monkbarrow," being an account of the life and work of the late Patrick Allan-Fraser, of Hospitalfield, Arbroath, contributed by Mr. George Hay; an illustrated article on "The Studio of Marie Bashkirtseff," by Mr. William Markwick, one of the editors of the magazine; a long poem by the Hon. Roden Noel, dealing with the social question, entitled "Poor People's Christmas;" a study of the poetry of Miss Emily Hickey; "The Real and the Ideal in Literature," by Mr. Kineton Parkes; and letters dealing with politics and the Irish question from the Ruskinian point of view.

THE Sun, which is now published by Mr. Alexander Gardner, will begin its new volume in October with a serial story by Mrs. Oliphant, entitled "The Railway Man and his Children."

THE Open Court Publishing Company, of Chicago, announce the publication of a new quarterly magazine, called the Monist, to be devoted to the establishment and illustration of the principles of monism in philosophy, exact science, religion, and philosophy. But, "so far as the fulfilment of this aim will allow, it will bear a popular character." The first number, to appear on October 1, will contain articles by Prof. G. J. Romanes, of the Royal Institution, and by Prof. E. D. Cope, of Philadelphia.

THE October number of the Leisure Hour contains a paper by the Rev. Harry Jones, describing the National Home Reading Union, which has met in the last two summers at Blackpool; and an illustrated article on "Irish Fairies," by Mr. W. B. Yeats.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

AT a meeting held in the chapter-house of St. Paul's, on Tuesday of last week, immediately after the funeral, it was resolved to invite subscriptions for a memorial to Dr. Liddon. After placing a personal memorial in St. Paul's, the fund will be devoted to promoting the more thorough study of theology, under the control of the authorities of Keble College, Oxford. Subscriptions were promised on the spot to the total amount of nearly £2500.

AT a meeting held in Glasgow last Tuesday, under the presidency of the Lord Provost, a resolution was adopted declaring it to be expedient that a chair for the teaching of political economy be founded and endowed in the university of Glasgow as a fitting memorial to Adam Smith and of his connexion with the university, and as supplying an important requirement in a commercial and industrial community.

THE university of Durham proposes to confer the honorary degree of D.C.L. upon Dr. Parke, of the Emin Pasha relief expedition, on October 21.

THE medical session at the three colleges which constitute the Victoria university will be opened next week—at Owens College, Manchester, by Sir Spencer Wells; at the Yorkshire College, Leeds, by Dr. Broadbent; and at the University College, Liverpool, by Sir James Paget.

PROF. R. K. DOUGLAS is to deliver the inaugural address of the autumn term of the School for Modern Oriental Studies, at University College, London, on Tuesday, October 14, at 5 p.m.

THE programme is now ready of the lectures to be delivered during the first session at University Hall, Gordon Square, under the auspices of the committee, of which Mrs. Humphry Ward is the hon. secretary. On October 8, Prof. J. Estlin Carpenter, of Manchester New College, will give his opening lecture on "The First Three Gospels and the Early Church"; and, on November 4, the Rev. Stopford Brooke will begin a course of six lectures on "English Poetry in the Nineteenth Century." The undertaking has received the support of Prof. Pfeiderer, of Berlin, and of Profs. Kuenen and Tiele, of Leiden.

DR. ANDREW, of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, will deliver the annual Harveian oration at the Royal College of Physicians on Saturday, October 18, at 4 p.m.

SIR FREDERICK POLLOCK will deliver the prizes at the medical school of St. Thomas's Hospital on Wednesday next, October 1, at 3 p.m., after which the various departments of the hospital and school will be open for the inspection of invited visitors.

THE Working Men's College, in Great Ormond-street, will open for its thirty-seventh session on Thursday next, October 2, when Sir John Lubbock will deliver an address as principal. Among those who have promised to give free popular lectures on Saturday evenings are Prof. Bonney, Miss Jane Harrison, Mr. J. Churton Collins, Mr. Sedley Taylor, and Mr. D. F. Schloss.

THE sixty-eighth session of the Birkbeck Literary and Scientific Institution will open on Wednesday next, October 1. The list of the Wednesday evening lecturers includes the names of Sir Robert S. Ball, Dr. Dallinger, Mr. Samuel Brandram, and Mr. J. T. Carrodus.

TRANSLATION.

FROM THE ITALIAN OF GIOVANNI MARRADI.

HOMEWARD from Fiesole—O sweet heart mine
Dost thou remember?—in that tranced hour
We turned our tired steps: Of a divine
Sadness our souls felt the subduing power.

Like an aerial gigantic pine
Star-cinctured, rose one solitary tower;
Alone emergent from the argentine Serenity—Saint Mary of the Flower.

All the rest vanished in the peace profound
Of that far distance where the trembling light
Seemed a transparent sea which had no bound;
While of thy voice the ripple, pure and bright,
Musically commingled with the sound
Of all the secret murmurs of the night.

EVELYN MARTINENGO-CESARESCO.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE new quarterly number of Folk-Lore (David Nutt) prints a charming paper read at the last meeting of the Folk-Lore Society by Miss Charlotte S. Burne, on "The Collection of English Folk-Lore." She here shows from her own experience in Shropshire the right method to go to work, and incidentally illustrates the connexion between folk-lore and history. Among the other contents are: a report, by Mr. Alfred Nutt, of his examination of the MSS. of the late J. F. Campbell, of Islay, preserved in the Advocates' Library at Edinburgh; "Notes on Chinese Folk-Lore," translated from a Hongkong daily paper, by Mr. J. H. Stewart Lockhart; a continuation of "Magic Songs of the Finns," translated by the Hon. John Abercromby; a hitherto inedited Hebrew text of the Riddles of Solomon, with translation and notes by Dr. S. Schechter; and a number of English and Scotch fairy tales, collected at various times by Mr. Andrew Lang. We may also mention a review, by Mr. Joseph Jacobs, the editor of the magazine, of some recent works on comparative religion, including Prof. Robertson Smith's "Religion of the Semites" and Mr. J. G. Frazer's "The Golden Bough," in which he re-states his arguments in favour of the borrowing hypothesis. The folk-lore bibliography, with which the magazine concludes, would be more valuable if fuller indication were given of the contents of the works mentioned.

TWO OF LYEF TOLSTOI'S LETTERS.*

THE first of these letters is of interest, as containing a criticism of Turgenev's On the Eve (Na Kanunye), by Tolstoi.

FROM LYEF TOLSTOI TO A. A. PHET.

February 23, 1890.

"... I have been reading On the Eve. Here is my opinion of it: It is useless to write novels; the more so for people who feel sad, and do not know what they want from life. But still On the Eve is far better than The Nest of Nobles†; and there are some excellent negative characters in it

* From "The Memoirs of 'A. A. Phet' [A. A. Shenshin]," in the Russian Review.

† Deoryanskoe Gnyezdo.

—the artist and the father. The others are not only not types, but not even the conception of them, and their situations are not typical. Or they are completely vulgar; and, indeed, this is the perpetual mistake of Turgenev. The girl is a perfect failure. ... 'Oh how I do love you. ... She had long eyelashes'. ... In fact, the thing that always astonishes me in Turgenev is that, with all his cleverness and poetical instinct, he cannot give up triviality, even in style. The most of this triviality is to be found in the negative touches, which remind me of Gogol. There is no humanity or compassion for the characters: they are painted monsters, which he abuses, but does not pity. This contrasts painfully with the general tone and liberal tendency of the rest. This was all very well in the time of 'Tsar Gorok'* and Gogol; and even now we must admit that if you have no pity for your most insignificant characters, you must either abuse them till the sky feels hot, or laugh to convulsions at them; and not in the way that Turgenev does—a prey to spleen and dyspepsia. One can say in general that there is no one now who could write such a novel, in spite of the fact that it would have no success. 'The Storm'† seems to me a deplorable composition, but it will have success. Of course, Ostrovski and Turgenev are not to blame, but the time. ...

"A man who will do in the poetical world what Bulgarin‡ did will not be born soon. ... But as to the lovers of antiquity, to whom I also belong, no one prevents them from reading serious poetry and novels, and seriously discussing them. Nowadays something else is wanted. We have not to acquire any more knowledge; but we have to teach Marfutka and Taraska§, at least to some extent, what we know ourselves. ...

"LYEF TOLSTOI."

In the second letter, Tolstoi describes the death of his brother, Nikolai, and the effect it produced on him. The death of Prince Andrei Bolkonski, in Peace and War (Voyna i Mir), and "The Death of Ivan Ilyitch," illustrate Tolstoi's artistic use of death, the one before and the other after 1860, when Nikolai Tolstoi died.

FROM LYEF TOLSTOI TO A. A. PHET.

"... I think you already know what happened. On September 20 he died, literally in my arms. ... Nothing in my life made such an impression on me. He used to say truly, that there is nothing worse than death. But when you consider seriously that death is the end of everything, then life becomes an unmitigated evil. What profits it, to strive and cry, when of what was once Nikolai Tolstoi ... nothing is left. He never said he felt the approach of death; but it seems to me he watched its every step and knew for certain how much time was still left. A few minutes before his death he dosed, and, suddenly awaking, whispered with horror, 'What is it?' It was that he saw death, this consumption of his being in nothingness, and if he found nothing to grasp, what shall I find? ... Less than nothing. ... And of course, neither I nor anyone else will struggle with death as he did. To the last moment he did not give himself up to death: did everything for himself; tried to be occupied, wrote, asked about my writings, and advised me; but all this, it seemed to me, he was doing, not by an inner tendency, but on principle. Only one thing, nature, was left to the end. On the eve of his death, he went into his room, and, through weakness, fell on his bed, near the window. When I came in he said, with tears in his eyes, 'how happy I was for a whole hour.' From earth he came. ... To earth he will return. ... One thing only is left: a dim hope that, somewhere in nature, a part of which you will become in the earth, there will be something left and found. Everyone who saw his last moments said how wonderfully quietly and calmly he died. But I know with what frightful tortures, because not a single feeling escaped me; a thousand times I repeat to myself, 'Let the dead bury their dead,' but I must spend the strength I still have on something. It is impossible to persuade the stone to tumble up, and not down, whither it is attracted. You cannot laugh at a jest you are weary of; you cannot eat when you are not hungry: ... what is the use of everything? To-morrow will begin all the tortures of death, with the uncleanness of lies, and self-deceiving, and will end in nothingness: nullity for yourself. ... Strange! ... 'Be useful: be virtuous: be happy as long as you live' ... say people to each other, and you say—'the happiness, the virtue, and the usefulness consist in truth.' And the truth I have gathered in thirty-two years is, that the situation we are placed in is terrible. 'Take life as it is; you put yourself in that situation.' Yes, of course; I do take it as it is. As soon as the man reaches a certain point of development he will see clearly that everything is folly, deceit; and the truth, which he still loves more than anything, is frightful. When you see it distinctly, you awake in terror and say, with my brother, 'What is it?' But, of course, so long as you possess the desire of knowing and telling truth, you will know, and tell it. This is all that is left to me out of my moral world above which I cannot put myself. This only will I do; but not in the form of your art. Art is a lie, and I can no longer love even a beautiful lie.

"LYEF TOLSTOI."

The death of his brother did more than any other event to change Tolstoi the artist into Tolstoi the apostle; to widen the gap between Childhood and Youth and the Kreutzer Sonata.

ENGLISH SCHOLARS AND THE "MORTE DARTHUR."

Aberdeen: Sept. 24, 1890.

All honour to Dr. Sommer for his edition of Malory's Morte Darthur. Mr. Lionel Johnson reviews it in the ACADEMY of September 20 with an enthusiasm which no English scholar will grudge at. But will you allow me to say that Mr. Johnson, in comprehensively charging English scholars with neglect and careless treatment of a delightful English classic, is something less than just to Sir Edward Strachey, who devoted to the humble Globe edition an amount of scholarly care no less worthy of recognition than Dr. Sommer's, and directed to a no less worthy purpose.

I think this should be mentioned because Dr. Sommer, in the preface to his first volume, inadvertently speaks of the Globe edition as "modernised and abridged." It is modernised in spelling, and here and there (though this very rarely) in words; but it is not abridged. I have not seen Dr. Sommer's second volume, but Mr. Johnson says that in it the various English editions, including Sir E. Strachey's, "are fully and admirably discussed"; and I have no doubt that the inadvertent misdescription of the preface is put right. Sir E. Strachey's treatment of the text is very far from careless. He used Southey's reprint of Caxton, but it was after satisfying himself by comparison with the original that, in spite of all its errors, it was sufficient for his purpose. His modernisation is done with loving care to preserve the flavour of the old language; indeed, the text is hardly modernised at all except in spelling and punctuation. I say this after comparing considerable portions of his text with Dr. Sommer's. Textual scholars and philologists owe Dr. Sommer a debt of gratitude for transcribing the Caxton with his own hand to ensure the correctness of his reprint. But that is no reason why we should disparage or ignore such a loving labour as Sir E. Strachey's, which fits the text for many who are capable of enjoying Malory, although to them the old spelling and the old punctuation are an unnecessary obstacle and irritation rather than an additional charm. To ignore such a service, by burying it under a general complaint of English neglect of the Morte Darthur, is to discourage lovers of our old literature from attempting a similar service for other of our old writers, whose power and beauty might be equally felt in English "as she is spelt."

There is a passage in Dr. Sommer's preface which deserves the attention of Her Majesty's Government. When he made up his mind to undertake this edition,

"I communicated," he says, "my intention to his Excellency the Royal Prussian Minister of Public Instruction, Herr Dr. von Gossler, requesting leave of absence for six months. My request was readily complied with, and for the prosecution of my labours I received a grant from public funds."

JUNIUS'S TRANSCRIPTS OF OLD ENGLISH TEXTS. Kingsley Gate, Wimbledon: September 6, 1890.

The Cotton MS., Tib. B. xi., of "Gregory's Pastoral Care," as represented by Junius's transcript in the Bodleian Library (MS. Junius 52) contains a number of cases where the O.E. cyrice is spelt cyrice. Dr. Sweet, the editor, and others are evidently disposed to attach a great deal of importance to the spellings of this transcript of the older Cotton MS. Some scholars would consequently be inclined to look upon cyrice as the more primitive of the two forms. How this difference in spelling affects the history of the word—and it should be distinctly understood that I take this word only as one typical case out of many—may be seen by a reference to Dr. Murray's Dictionary sub voce "church."

Some little time ago Dr. Murray and myself got talking about the value of Junius's transcripts for linguistic purposes. The only fault that Dr. Sweet finds with Junius is (Gregory's Pastoral Care, p. 19) that he "sometimes swerved from the path of literal accuracy in a few unimportant particulars." It will, I hope, be readily seen that if I try to diminish the brightness of this halo of faithfulness, I do not do so in the cavilling spirit of one who feels his superiority, but merely in order to prevent others from being led astray by Junius's orthography. Nor do I claim to be the first to point this out. Others have done so before me. I write to you because Dr. Murray expressed his opinion that it would be worth while to give more publicity to these strictures than is likely to be afforded by footnotes or statements made in passing, which are always apt to be overlooked.*

In order to allow the reader to judge for himself, I shall proceed to give a specimen of Junius's method of transcription by printing (1) a part of folio 165b of the MS. Tib. A. 3 (a fragment of the so-called "Regulae S. Fulgentii," cf. Rule of S. Benet, E.E.T.S., fol. 90, Intro., p. xxiv), and (2) Junius's copy of the same passage in the Bodleian MS. 52. I prefix an asterisk to the words or forms in connexion with which a discrepancy occurs:

The result of a comparison of the preceding passages will be found to bear out most of a former statement of mine, to the effect that Junius "adds words not in his MSS. He leaves out words found in his original or transposes them. He does not distinguish between ð and þ . . . lastly, he corrects his text without giving the reading of the MS.;" and it will hence be seen that too much stress should not be laid on any particular spelling which is supported only by a Junius copy.

‡ The abbreviation for autem (h with a c superscript to the right) was evidently not understood by Junius, who consequently omitted the word.

"ARABIAN POETRY FOR ENGLISH READERS."

Glasgow: Sept. 22, 1890.

In his review of Mr. Arbuthnot's Arabic Authors, which appears in the ACADEMY of September 13, Prof. Salmoné justly complains of the lack of interest in Arabian literature (he might have said Oriental literature generally) in this country.

The learned scholar has, however, made a slight mistake in ascribing Arabic Poetry for English Readers to my old and valued friend Sir James W. Redhouse (p. 215). Although that veteran's contributions to the work* are doubtless the most important from a scholar's point of view, yet I am very sure he has no need of, nor would he desire, any little credit properly belonging to another to be added to the rich meed of praise which his services in the cause of Oriental studies have gained him in the course of his long, useful, and honourable career. The Arabian anthology referred to by Prof. Salmoné was projected, edited, and produced by me, for private subscribers, early in 1881; and the venture proved a most gratifying success, in spite of prognostications to the contrary, of some friends steeped to the lips in what they and their like absurdly term "the classics"—as though Arabia, Persia, India, and all other civilised countries had not each their own classics!

A very limited edition of this work was printed; and as a large proportion of it went into the university and public libraries of this country and America, as well as into the libraries of men of high rank, it is now so "scarce" that a copy would probably fetch three times the original subscription price. This first attempt to popularise Arabian poetry among our countrymen has been, I am assured, appreciated by general readers, who frequently call for the book in public libraries. Whether the time will ever come when it would "pay" (from a publisher's point of view) to print an ordinary edition of it, is to say the least, very doubtful. There is certainly no sign of such a desirable consummation at present, when "educated" and half-educated people alike care for nothing but the frothiest of frothy fiction, whether in the form of three-volume novels or of serials—"to be continued in our next"—written, for the most part, by women, and, in the lower strata, very evidently by nursery-governesses and lady's-maids! When there is so little taste for good English literature, need we wonder that but few care for Oriental studies?

Give me leave to mention, further, that a companion volume to my book, entitled Persian Poetry for English Readers, by S. Robinson, and edited by me, was privately printed in 1883, and of the 300 copies printed 200 were presented to eminent scholars, and university and public libraries in this country, America, Australia, and the continent of Europe, the translator and editor reserving the remaining copies for their own use. This work contains specimens of the six greatest classical poets of Persia: Firdausi, Nizami, Sa'di, Jelal ed-Din er-Rumi, Hafiz, and Jami, with biographical notices and notes. It is also a very "scarce" book.

W. A. CLOUSTON.

[The passage in question in Prof. Salmoné's review ought to have been as follows: "Sir

A great desideratum, by the way, is a handy reprint of Redhouse's translation of a much more famous Arabic L-Poem, that of Shanfara', the robber-poet, which appeared in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society in 1881 or 1882—a noble

"BATHYBIUS" AND "PAUL NUGENT, MATERIALIST."

Carshalton: September 22, 1890.

Will you allow me, also in the interest of fair play, to point out that there is no attempt in the book Paul Nugent, Materialist, to palm off "Bathybius" or "Huxley's life in the depths" as the name of a sceptical man of science.

On reference to page 123, vol. ii., it will be found that we say:

"We've rather a stronger foundation than Strauss had himself when he challenged the world with the new-found theory of Bathybius. According to him [Strauss] Bathybius had expelled miracle," &c.

Thus we simply state that Strauss used the theory of the sheet of living protoplasm, called Bathybius, to refute the fact of miracle. And immediately afterwards we refer to "Bathybius Hæckelii," surely a clear indication that we never either made so gross an error as to suppose that Bathybius was a person, or attempted to palm the theory off as such upon unsuspecting Church people.

We can only suppose that the writer of the article in the Newbery House Magazine, forgetting that he had made no reference to Strauss, used the pronoun "he" instead of the name of the German critic, thereby, through a slip of the pen, laying himself open to J. B. M.'s sarcasms.

SCIENCE.

Annals of Bird Life. By Charles Dixon.
(Chapman & Hall.)

THIS pleasant volume shows that its author has not only seen many birds, but that he also possesses an acute eye for seeing them. For twenty years, he tells us, he has been in the habit daily of noting the phenomena of bird-life, and now he puts his memoranda together into some half-dozen chapters for each of the seasons. The defect of the book is that no locality is named to indicate where these studies were made. Birds migrate and build considerably earlier in one part of England than in another. It is an entirely untrustworthy method to make careful observations in many different districts (as seems to have been done by Mr. Dixon), and then to mass them all together. From one page, indeed, it may be gathered that he studied birds in Derbyshire; in the preface he dates from Torquay. In the body of the book notes on nightingales are given; but such a bird is never seen at Torquay. Sea-birds, too, are carefully described; shore birds and even mountain birds. As accounts of birds' habits the book is useful, but regarded as a chronicle of the succession of birds and their different employments in each district it is useless. It does not suit the meridian of Perth or of Berwick, of Leeds or of Selborne. Again, at the end of the chapters on each season, a calendar is added of the different birds' habits and occupations in each month. It is obvious that this is a rough-and-ready

method which suits one district and not another, and one month only if fine and genial or the reverse. As a matter of convenience, too, these tables should have been alphabetical rather than generic. By way of amends, however, the author gives a very full and satisfactory general index. These remarks are not intended to disparage a good book, but to prove that it might easily have been made a better one.

To the lover of birds in their native haunts this book will form a capital handbook season by season, provided that he knows enough about them to eliminate those which do not frequent his district. Better still, it may prove an incentive for him to study the ornithological annals of his own neighbourhood. We do not possess too many Gilbert Whites or A. E. Knoxes. Every here and there a doubtful statement may be noticed in these "Annals." We believe no nest of the snow-bunting has ever been found in the Grampians; but it has been taken in North Unst, and in 1885 was discovered for the first time high up on a Sutherlandshire mountain. The kite has not altogether "ceased to rear its young" in this country. One or two Welsh localities for its nests are known. The poetical descriptions of the seasons might well have been omitted, most bird-lovers will think. Nor will they all agree with the author's extravagant estimate of a bird's life: that it is "full of poesy and intellectual fire"; that migration is a "rational" process; that birds are "creatures endowed with mind, with mental powers very similar to those which control the movements of man himself," and the like. Given these and the Archaeopteryx and the "ancestral shore lark" to boot, Mr. Dixon elicits nothing more from a bird's life-history than the old-fashioned believers in instinct have done. It is a misuse of words to affirm that "birds are unquestionably gifted with extensive powers of reason"; although the bird-lover may well permit Mr. Dixon's enthusiasm to override his judgment, so long as he himself is not called upon to espouse the sentiments.

But enough of this; it is much more pleasant to recognise some of the excellent features of the book. Thus, it contains a good account of the rarer accidental spring visitors, as they may be called, with a list, in each case, of points of discrimination. This will be of considerable interest to the young student of birds. Similarly, spring-time on the mountains is another well-written account. Mr. Dixon has visited St. Kilda and has a good deal to say about its fulmars. His discussion on sparrow-hawks and sparrows is also much to the point; he would allow the former to live in order that they might act as nature's police, and keep down the swarms of sparrows which so grievously injure the small suburban farmer. His remarks, too, on rooks returning frequently during winter "to inspect their old nests," and that about the same time in the day, commend themselves to every lover of the country. The great autumnal impulse for departure which so wonderfully affects our wild birds is capitally described, and another useful list of rare autumnal strangers appended. Perhaps the best chapter of all contains careful observations on the tracks which birds leave behind on soft mud or snow. It is a subject full of interest to every bird-lover, and enables him to philosophise during the dull days of winter in a region of inquiry which has hitherto been little worked.

Annals of Bird Life is brightly written and full of information. It may be hoped that Mr. Dixon will continue his observations, and some day publish them with exact indications of locality. Such a book would be of extreme value to the local naturalist or historian, and a delight to the ordinary lover of birds.

1. Andaka.

ANDAKA, not in Childers's Dictionary, occurs in Jāt. iii. 260, l. 10, in the compound andaka-vāca, explained by the commentary as sadosa-vāca. There is a variant (Burmese) reading, kandaka-vāca; and Prof. Kern, attaching somewhat too much importance to this lection, takes Dr. Fausbøll to task for not adopting kantaka-vāca, a likely reading, suggested by the Sanskrit vākkanta in Mahābhārata V. 1267.

At one time I was disposed to regard andaka as a scribal blunder for candaka (see Pāli Text Soc. Journ. for 1886, p. 105); but as we find in Dhammasaṅgani 1343 the same form in the phrase "Yā sā vācā andakā asatā kakkasā, &c.," I have no doubt that the reading in the Jātaka-book is correct, and should be retained. But what is the origin of the word andaka? One MS. reads atthakavāco for addhakavāco. This looks as if andaka were a derivative of the root ard, "to hurt, pain," which in Pāli assumes the form add (as well as add and att), whence we get the adjective addana, corresponding to Sanskrit ardana. This might become (1) **andana*, and (2) andaka, the primary meaning of which would be "paining, vexing," hence "sharp, bitter," as opposed to the meaning of sanha and sakhila.

2. Avātuka = apātuka, 3. Vedhavera, 4. Nekatiha
"NEKATIKĀ vāñcanikā kuṭasakkhī AVĀTUKĀ."
(Thera Gāthā, v. 940, p. 86.)

AVĀTUKA looks at first sight as representing an original avātuka, "hypocritical"; but two MSS. of the Thera-Gāthā read apātuka, "sly, crooked, disingenuous" (?), formed from the adjective apatu, "unskilled, awkward."

In Jātaka iv. p. 184, we find the following passage: "Sukkaṭṭhavi vedhaverā thullabhā apātubhā," where the last adjective is a mere blunder of the scribe, due to the ending of the previous word, for apātukā, which is explained in the commentary to the Jātaka-book by apātubhāvā, dhanupādāvirahitā.

The form VEDHAVERA is very curious. It is explained in the commentary by vidhavā, apatika, a "widow"; but vedhavera, according to Kaccāyana, signifies a "widow's son," and represents Sanskrit vaidhaveya, which, however, does not give here the sense required by the context. Ought we not to read vedheyaka or vedheraka "foolish, blockish"?

Perhaps the Sanskrit vaidhaveya had the meaning of "fool," for in one passage in Čakuntala* we find "pralapatyeshā vaidhaveyah" for "pralā. vaidheyah," where vaidheya is explained by one commentator as mārka, "a blockhead." In another commentary that I have seen vaidheya is glossed by vālīsha, i.e. bālīsha, "a fool, foolish, childish." In Amarakoṣa, III. i. 48, we find these terms associated: "ajñamūdhayathājāta-mūrkharaidheyaabālīsha." Perhaps vaidhavera and vaidhaveya had also, like bāla, the meaning of child, childish, and hence "foolish."

Childers gives nekatika, "fallacious,"* without any authority, but "dishonest" seems to be the more correct sense, cf.

"Kūṭassa hi santi kūṭakutā bhavati cāpi nikatino nikatyā." (Jāt. ii. 183.)

The commentary has the following note:

"Bhavati cāpi nikatino nikatyā ti nikatino nekatissa vañcanakassa puggalapa nikatyā aparo, nikatikāraṇo vañcanakapuriso bhavati yeva."—See Jāt. iii. 102; compare:

"Māyavino nekatikā."—Jāt. iv. p. 184, l. 12.

Nekatika in Jāt. iv. p. 42, is glossed by vañcaka. See Majjhima, i. p. 180.

Nikati and nikaranā are employed in Puggala Paññatti (pp. 19, 23) to explain māyā, "deceit."

5. Asuropa.

The word ASUROPA, not registered by Childers, occurs in Puggala-Paññatti as a synonym of koḍha, "anger," and in Dhammasaṅgani as a synonym of dosa (i.e. dvesa), "enmity, hatred." While the meaning is tolerably clear, its etymology is by no means self-evident. If it be regarded as a-suropa, from a-surūpa, we might get from the compound some such meaning as "displeasure"; but if we look upon it as asu-ro-pa, from an adjective **āsu-rūpa* corresponding to an original **āsu-rūpa*, we might attach to it the primary sense of "hastiness, quickness of temper." Or it is possible that asuropa is from **asuyyārūpa*, through **asūrārūpa*, "angry," "malevolent."

6. Assa.

We find the word ASSA, "ashes," in the compound ASSA-puta "a basket of ashes." It occurs in Anguttara-Nikāya iv. 242-3 "assa-putam khandhe āropetvā," where the Burmese MSS. read bhasma-putam. We find it also in Digha-Nikāya iii. i. 26—"assa-putena [v.l. bhasma]-vadhivā," explained in the commentary by "bhasma-putena." The passage in the Anguttara shows that the addition "sise chārikam okiritvā" is a mistake (see Sumaṅgalavilāsini, p. 267). The etymology of the word is not clear. Can it be for amsa, and come from a root ams to shine, as seen in amṣu?

7. Ānaka.

In Sanskrit ĀNKA is the name of a kind of kettledrum beaten only at one end. We have a trace of it in Pāli in the following passage from the Saṃyutta-Nikāya xx. 73:—

"Bhūtapubbam . . . Dasārahānam ānako nāma mudīṅgo ahoṣi. Tassa Dasārahā ānake ghatite aññam ānim odahimsu; ahu kho so . . . samayo yam ānakassa mudīṅgassa porānam pokkharaphalakam antaradhāyi, āni-saṅghāto va avasissi."

From this quotation and the application that follows we gather that when the injured drum received another set of pins or pegs (āni-saṅghāto) which were not suitable to the purpose, the head (pokkhara-phalaka) was damaged and rendered useless. This use of āni, as applied to the fixtures of a drum, is very curious. For other senses of the word see Cullavagga x. 16, 2; Thera-Gāthā, vv. 355, 744, pp. 39, 73; Sumaṅgala, p. 39.

8. Ināyika.

In the Journal of the Pāli Text Society for 1887, p. 109, I showed that the word INĀYIKA, though usually explained as a "debtor," is usually found in the sense of "creditor," cf.

*Benfey assigns this meaning to Sk. naikṛitika. Burnell renders it "malignant" in Manu iv. 196.

"ināyikehi codiyamāno," in the commentary to Petavattu I. i. p. 71. There is only one passage in our printed texts (Mahāvagga i. 46) where it has the signification of "debtor," answering in meaning to the Sanskrit rinika. It is quite possible that ināyika may represent (1) Sk. rinika, a debtor, and (2) Sk. **rindiyika* (cf. rinayāvan), one who goes after a debt, a creditor.

There is, however, a word to which it may be related, namely, the Sanskrit anika (= rinika?) in Āpastamba I. i. 16, rendered, according to Prof. Bühler, by one commentator, "a money-lender," cf. Sk. ānriṇya with Pāli ānariya (Suttavibhanga i. p. 284; Sum., p. 215); "freedom from debt," and anana "free from debt."

9. Ujjaṅgala.

UJJĀNGALA for jangala occurs in Vimāna lxxiv. 5, p. 78, and is written ujjaṅgala in Petavattu ii. 9. 70, where it is glossed by ativiyathaddhabhūmibhāga.

10. Kanhābhijātika. 11. Rumma, rummī.

"Brahmabhūtam atitulam Mārasenappamaddanam. Ko disvā na-ppasīdeyya api kanhābhijātiko."

"Who having seen him (Buddha) the most eminent, the matchless, the crusher of Māra's army, is not appeased, even if he be 'of black origin'" (Sutta-Nipāta, v. 563; Thera-Gāthā, v. 833). What is meant by kanhābhijātika, "of black origin"? Namuci or Māra is called "the black one" in Sutta-Nipāta, v. 438, just as the devil is traditionally represented as "black." In the passage quoted above, "of black origin" does not refer to Māra, but to one of the "demon-race," more especially to a pisāca.

There is a good story with reference to the use of kanhā, "black," as applied to a pisāca in the Ambaṭṭha-sutta (Digha-Nikāya III. i. 18; see also Jāt. iv. 9). Disā, a slave of Okkāka, king of the Sakya race, gave birth to a black child, who received the opprobrious designation of Kanhā, "black." He was neither pleased with his name nor complexion, and used to say to his mother: "Have me washed, mammy, and cleansed from this dirtiness, and I shall then be of some use to you." In those days, the story adds, pisācas were called "black." "Yathā kho pana . . . etarahi manussā piśāce piśācāti sañjānanti, evam eva kho . . . tena samayena manussā piśāce pi kanhāti sañjānanti." In the older Sanskrit literature non-Aryans and demons seemed to have been called "black-skins." For kanhābhijāti, see Sumaṅgala i. p. 163, and compare Thera-Gāthā, v. 140, p. 19. In the Jātaka book a dirty and untidy person is compared to a mudspite (pamsu-pisācaka).

"Kuto nu āgacchasi RUMMA-vāsi Ottallako pamsupisācako va."

(Jāt. iv. pp. 380, 384.)

RUMMA, not in Childers's Dictionary, seems to have the sense of (1) dark, tawny; (2) dirty. Compare rumma-rūpi (Jāt. iv. 387), "Pajam imam passatha rumma-rūpin." Sanskrit rumra means "tawny," and might possibly become rumma, though it would ordinarily take the form of rumba. Rumma might represent an original rumya, but cf. tamba = Sanskrit tāmbra. We have the form RUMMī, "dirty," in Jāt. iv. p. 322 ("RUMMī rajojalladharo aghe vehāsayam hito"), which evidently points to the Sanskrit rukmin (from ruc, to shine); cf. English black and blank; so that rumma corresponds to Sanskrit rukma, just as Pāli rummaratī represents Sanskrit rukmaratī.

The commentary explains rummī and rummarūpi as anañjitamanditā; rummavasi is glossed by "anañjitamanditaghatitasāṅghāti pilotikavasano."

12. Kāca.

In Cullavagga, v. 9. 2, we find kācamaya "made of glass," or more properly, "made of crystal." In Simāvivādavinicchayākathā (p. 28, P.T. Soc. Journal, 1887), we have kācalimpita, "glazed." In Divyāvadāna mention is made of kācamani (crystal) that shone like a real gem, and in Jāt. ii. p. 418 a precious stone (mani) is described as a-kāca, "without kāca," free from impurity. "Ayam mani veluriyo akāco vimalo subho." The commentary explains akāca by a-kakkasa (Sk. a-karkasa), which usually means "not rough, smooth" (see Jāt. iii. 282); but here a-kakkasa must mean "free from grit." Compare the following passage, where kakkasa signifies "gritty": "Kāmadadassāpi . . . maniratanassa ekadesam kakkasam uppajjati, na ca tattha kakkasa-uppannattā maniratanam hīlitaṃ nāma hoti" (Mil. p. 252.) The Sanskrit karkara, Marathi kaṅkar, means both "hard" and also a nodule of limestone, and kakkasa must = kāca. Kakkasa is used as a noun, meaning "harshness," in Sutta Nipāta v. 328, p. 58.

"Sārambha-kakkasa-kasāva-muccham hitvā."

Ākācī, "smooth," occurs in Vimāna, 60, 1, p. 55—

"Susukkakhandham abhiruyha nāgam Ākācinam dantibaliṃ mahājavam."

13. Kunda, sañ-kundita, kundalikata.

"Kena te aṅguli kundā mukhaṃ ca kundalikatam" (Petavattu ii. 9. 27).

KUNDA=kunita anujjubhūta, probably connected with the root kund, "to maim" (originally to twist, wring?) signifies crooked, twisted; cf. sañ-kundita in quotation below.

KUNDALIKATA, in form but not in meaning, represents Sanskrit kundalikṛita, "ring-streaked," "coiled-up" (?).

According to the commentary on the Petavattu it signifies "contorted, awry"—"mukhavikārena vikucitam sañkunditam."

14. Kujj=Kulj.

The verb KUJ is not a very productive root in Sanskrit, and is of very limited application.

Childers gives from this root nikkujjati, and nikkujjeti, but has no mention of kujja (Sutta Nipāta, v. 242, p. 42); nikkujja, "turned upside down" (Puggala, p. 31).

AVAKUJJA seems to occur in the sense of "all of a heap, huddled together" in avakujjā patāmase (Petavattu iv. 10. 8, p. 66). It also means "lying face downwards" (Jāt. i. 13).

In Puggala-Paññatti, p. 31, "avakujja-pañña" is an epithet applied to a person who does not bear in mind what he hears, "whose wits are muddled," "muddle-headed."

This use of avakujja seems to show that Childers's explanation of nikkujjati is correct. It means "to take in," "to lay to heart," and represents kulj + ni, and should always be written with one k and not with two, as in some MSS. and texts. (See Sumang, p. 160; Digha ii. 17, 21.)

In Sumangala, p. 287, Buddhaghosa has "nikkujjita-mukha," "with the face toward the ground," "with closed mouth," in contradistinction to "uttāna-mukha," "with open countenance," "communicative" (?). This use of nikkujjita looks like a confusion with the roots kulj and kucc = kuñc.

We have in Pāli from the root kuc, "to bend," sañkucita (-mukha), "frowning" (Sum. p. 287); vikucita (Petavattu ii. 9. 27).

The root kut, "to bend," occurs in sañkutita (Mil. p. 257); patikutati (Mil. p. 297, ll. 15, 22; sañkutita (Ib., p. 297, l. 19).

PAṬIKUJJETI, omitted by Childers, signifies "to enclose," "Sa pātim aññāya suvaṇṇa-pātiyā patikujjetvā" (Jāt. i. p. 69). See i. p. 50, "tuccapātim eva aññāya patiāyā patikujjetvā pesesi" (Dhammapada, p. 140, l. 24). At p. 140, l. 1, it is miswritten patikujjivā.

* Read dantim balim (?).

15. Kṛi Kṛi.

Childers has no instances of the root Kṛi, to injure, hurt; but compare "karato kārāyato, chindato chedāpāyato" (Majjhima-Nikāya i. p. 516; Digha-Nikāya ii. 15, 17). In the Jātaka-book we find kata, "injured," and kattā, "injurer." "Na katassa ca kattā (kattu?) ca metti sandhiyate puna" (Jāt. iii. p. 136). In Jāt. iv. p. 42 we find katana.

"Yam me tvam sammā akkhāsi Sākhena katanam katam."

There are various readings: (1) kadhānam = katana for kantana; (2) kantam. The first would represent a Sk. kṛitana or kṛintana, the other Sk. kranta.

The commentary contains the following note: "Katanam katan ti ākaddhana-vikaddhana-pothana-kottana-saṅkhātam katanam katan ti attho."

In Sumangala Vilāsini i. p. 137, we find massu-karāna-tthāya, "for the purpose of hair-cutting." Cf. Pāli kāraṇā, "torture" in kāranaghara, Jāt. ii. 128, and see kāraṇa, Majjhima Nikāya i. p. 446.

16. Kālusiya.

Disā-kālusiya is employed by Buddhaghosa in Sumangala Vilāsini i. p. 96, to explain disā-dāha (Digha I. i. 24). Kālusiya, "obscurity," ought properly to be written kālusiya or kālussa, representing Sanskrit kālūshya, "foulness, turpitude"; the Burmese MSS. read kālusiya.

17. Ke'anā, Patikelanā, Kelāyati.

Childers has no notice of these words, which occur in Sumangala-Vilāsini i. p. 286: "Vigatā-cāpāllo ti patta-mandanā cīvāra-mandanā senā-sana-mandanā imassa vā pūṭṭikāyassa kelanā patikelanāti evam vutta-cāpālya-virahito." The Burmese MSS. have kelāyānā and patikelāyānā. Kelanā in the above quotation seems to signify "adornment." If connected with kil, "to play," keli, "sport," it ought to mean "amusement." Hemacandra, in his Prakrit grammar, tells us that kelāya may be substituted for samārac, "to adorn," hence from a verb kelāyati we get the noun kelanā, or kelāyānā. But the Pāli kelāyati (not in Childers) always signifies "to desire." See Jāt. iv. p. 198; Milinda-Pañha, p. 73, where it is explained by mamāyati, piheti. The root is probably kel, "to quiver, shake." We find a verb kalāyati for kelāyati (?) in the sense of "to sport with, deceive," in Jātaka i. p. 163.

18. Khalayati.

"Gale gahetvā khalayātha jammam" (Jāt. iv. 205). The note in the commentary is "khalayātha khalikāram pāpetvā middhamatha." Khalayati in meaning corresponds to niddhameti; compare Sk. ksālayati, "to remove," from the root ksal, "to wash." See pakkhāleti (Sum. i. p. 46; Vimāna 63. 4); vikkhāleti (Petavatthu, p. 97).

Khalati, from the root skhal, to stumble, occurs in Milanda, p. 187; Thera Gāthā, v. 45; pakkhalati in Sum. i., p. 37; avakkhalita (v. l. apakkhalita) ib. p. 66.

19. Gaccha.

The only meaning assigned to gaccha in Childers is "shrub, plant"; but in Jāt. iii. p. 287, gaccha is used for "meadow." "Kaham so [sūkaro] ti?" "Ayam etasmim gacche ti." "So gacchā nikkhamitvā" (ib. p. 288). There are no various readings, nor is there any Sanskrit gaccha to which it can be referred. It seems to represent, however, Sanskrit kaccha, "grass-land, marsh-land." In Sutta Nipāta (v. 20) we have "kacche (v. l. gacche in Burmese MSS.); rūḥatane caranti gāvo" = "in meadows abounding with grass cows are grazing." In a Gāthā attached to this story (Jāt. iv. p. 288) suṇṇāminī (= sāminī) = Sk. svāminī, "mistress."

20. Canditta.

Childers has canda, but not canditta. We find the latter, however, in Puggala-Paññatti as a synonym of kodha, and in Dhammasaṅgani of dosa. It is sometimes misprinted, owing to the confusion of t and k in the MSS., as candikka (Dhammasaṅgani; 1060 Suttavibhanga i. p. 297).

Canditta is an abstract noun formed from canda and represents Sanskrit candatra, which in Pāli would become (1) candatta and (2) canditta.

21. Calaka.

CALAKA, not in Childers's Dictionary, occurs in Digha-Nikāya ii. 14, and is explained by Buddhaghosa (Sum. p. 156) as an official who assisted in marshalling the troops by acting as herald, and crying out, "here make room for the king," or "here make place for such a state-officer."

Calaka, "a herald," can hardly be referred to the root cal, "to shake"; most likely it is connected with a root cal (a softened form of kal), "to call out or shout."

SCIENCE NOTES.

THE veteran Dr. James Croll is once more in the field with a new book entitled The Philosophical Basis of Evolution, which Mr. Stanford will publish shortly, uniform in appearance with the other works from the same pen.

A WORK ON Animal Life and Intelligence, by Prof. Lloyd Morgan, of University College, Bristol, will be published by Mr. Edward Arnold in October. This book, upon which the author has been engaged for several years, will contain a careful discussion of the factors of organic evolution, of the range and limits of natural selection, of the problems of heredity, and of the origin of variations. The latter part is devoted to considering the nature and limits of our knowledge of animal intelligence and emotion. Instinct is considered in the light of modern views of heredity; the distinctions between human reason and animal intelligence (as defined) are discussed; an hypothesis of inter-neural evolution is suggested; and the monistic interpretation of phenomena is set forth and developed. The work is intended for general readers as well as for students, technical phrases being used as sparingly as possible, and in all cases fully explained. About forty illustrations will be given.

MESSRS. SWAN SONNENSCHNEIN & Co. have in preparation a Botany for Students, by Dr. Edward Aveling. The subject will be treated in a practical way, and will be adapted to the needs of students at Science and Art classes, and for matriculation at London University. There will be 267 illustrations.

FINE ART.

GRÉBAUT'S FORTHCOMING WORK ON THE NATIONAL EGYPTIAN MUSEUM.*

IN the days of the old Bulaq Museum, and under the famous régime of its founder, Mariette Pasha, was issued that beautiful and scarce volume, L'Album du Musée de Bulaq, which it may be remembered met with an untimely fate, the whole stock having perished in the fire which destroyed the premises of M. Mourès, at Cairo. Fortunately, therefore, are those who possess the few copies yet extant, preserving as they do the only photographic record of those delightful galleries which were literally the creation of Mariette, and in which he lay in state before his remains were placed to rest in the garden of the Museum. But now all those treasures of ancient art have crossed the Nile to their new home in the palace of Ghizeh; Mariette is no more; and Maspero has been and gone; and M. Grébaut reigns in his stead. Neither is the collection the same as of old; for not only is there room in the new building for all the treasures which were heretofore stored out of sight for lack of space, but new acquisitions have of late poured in from Luxor, from Ekhmim, from Bubastis, from Hawara, Coptos, and many other sites. Thus, in course of time, the old Bulaq collection will become but the nucleus of a new museum, the extent of which it is impossible to foresee, and which, if it continues to grow at the present rate, must exceed in splendour, variety, and historical interest all the Egyptian collections of Europe put together.

It is, therefore, a happy thought on the part of M. Grébaut to celebrate this new point of departure in the history of the national Egyptian collection by issuing the opening numbers of a great illustrated work, which shall as adequately represent the riches of the new museum as the former album represented those of the earlier building. Of this work, through the courtesy of M. Grébaut, I have received the plates of the first part in advance of publication. These are twenty in number, admirably autotyped from brilliant photographic originals, which, it is to be presumed, were executed by the skilled hand of E. Brugsch Bey. The subjects are interesting and various, comprising the recently-found statuettes of Khafra, Menkara, and Menkauphor of the IVth Dynasty; of Userenra of the Vth Dynasty; and of one more remarkable than all the rest for character and dignity—an unknown king of the same period. Here, too, we have an engraved and tinted plan of the newly-excavated temple of Prince Uatmes at Gurnah, as well as several plates reproducing the stelae and fragments of stelae, there discovered, including two votive tablets to the Bull Apis. Other plates reproduce statues, fragments of statues, and inscriptions of widely separate periods, ranging from the XVIIIth Dynasty to the time of Tiberius. Among these are to be especially noted a curious archaic figure of a kneeling slave from the site of Memphis (pl. xiii.); a much weathered tablet with a Greek inscription across the base, from Gebelayn (pl. xvi.); a remarkable wooden sarcophagus, in the style of the granite sarcophagi of the XXVIth Dynasty, from Uardan, in the Libyan range of mountains—a site of which we now hear for the first time (pl. xix.); and a most beautiful stela (pl. xvii.) with incised hieroglyphs and an elaborate funerary tableau in low relief, apparently of the XVIIIth Dynasty, in memory of one Entef, a priest, prince, and governor of a province. The figures of Entef and his wife, and the offerings of fruits, vegetables, geese, lotuses in flower and bud, joints of meat, cakes, &c., are rendered with an exquisite fidelity and finish, equal, if not superior, to the bas-relief sculptures of the tomb of Ti.

None of the monuments represented in this first number have been previously photographed, and all are the results of recent excavation. The importance of the statuettes of the kings of the Ancient Empire cannot be overrated, the only royal statue of this remote period extant up to the present time being those of Khafra discovered by Mariette at Ghizeh.

It is M. Grébaut's intention to make this work as interesting to the cultivated public as to those who are professedly Egypt-ologists. He will include not only inscriptions, but all kinds of beautiful works of art, such as bronzes, drawings, paintings, embroideries, jewellery, wood-carvings, and all the thousand and one fanciful and charming objects upon which the craftsman of ancient Egypt delighted to exercise his ingenuity. In short, it will be a book for all who care for archaeology and art.

I am informed by M. Grébaut that each part, when published, will contain some pages of printed matter, describing the date, size, and material of each and every object, and giving some account of where and how it was discovered.

AMELIA B. EDWARDS.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

IN the October number of the Magazine of Art, the editor, Mr. M. H. Spielmann, again returns to the question—should there be a "British artists' room," like that at the Uffizi in Florence, in the National Portrait Gallery? Encouraged by the reception which his former article met with, he approached Mr. George Scharf, the director, and also the trustees individually. Mr. Scharf replied in a valuable contribution, dealing with the subject generally, which is here printed. While approving of the scheme, he does not see how limitations of space would allow it to be carried out as an actual part of the proposed new building. The trustees, while naturally sheltering themselves under their official position, are, on the whole, distinctly unfavourable, the only enthusiastic supporter of the scheme being Lord Ronald Gower, who backs his opinion by promising to present to the gallery two little portraits of Reynolds and Gainsborough in his own possession.

THE first set of scholarships, founded out of the accumulated funds of the defunct British Institution, have been awarded, after competition, as follows: for painting, to Mr. Frank J. Mackenzie and Mr. Charles M. Gere; for sculpture, to Mr. Henry C. Fehr.

THE usual autumn exhibition of the Photographic Society of Great Britain will be opened on Monday next, September 29, in the gallery of the Royal Society of Painters in Water-Colours, Pall Mall East. To-day (Saturday) there is a private view, and also a soirée in the evening. The exhibition is open on three evenings of the week; and on every Wednesday evening transparencies will be shown with an optical lantern.

THE sixth series of "one man" exhibitions will be opened at the Camera Club, Bedford-street, on Monday, October 6. It will consist of a representative collection of photographs by Mr. Lyd. Sawyer, of Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

WE have to record the death on September 17 of Patrick Allan Fraser, hon. member of the Royal Scottish Academy. He was trained as an artist, was a close friend of the late John Phillip, and would himself have been a thoroughly capable painter had not the acquisition of a large fortune precluded him from spending his life in the professional pursuit of art. By his will, nearly his entire means has been devoted to maintaining thirty young and promising students, and training them in the fine and the decorative arts. Each is to be indentured for a period of four years; and Mr. Fraser's noble mansion of Hospitalfield, near Arbroath (of which, with its art treasures, an account will be found in Mr. Millar's Castles of Perthshire and Fifeshire, recently reviewed in the ACADEMY) is to be fitted up for their accommodation. Day-students from Arbroath are also to receive instruction along with the foundationers, a certificated art-teacher being appointed as the governor of the house. By a further provision of his will, ten aged or infirm professional men—four painters, three sculptors, and three literary men—are to receive £50 per annum during life.

THE STAGE.

OBITUARY.

TWO theatrical people, of very different value to the contemporary stage, have died within the last ten days. We refer, of course, to Mr. Dion Boucicault, who was sixty-eight, and to Mdm. Jeanne Samary, who was but little over thirty. Let us speak first of Mr. Boucicault, a man who in his time played many parts, as actor, author, manager—who came to the front early, and who, notwithstanding a certain flexibility which permitted him to retain in middle life a place hardly warranted by his talent, had of late years fallen into semi-obscurity. Even the variety of his abilities did not suffice to keep alive in the better part of the public any vital interest in his fortunes. Yet he had decided gifts, and for a time they were acceptable. He had wonderful perseverance, much social and literary brightness, and a convincing belief in his own capacity. Mr. Boucicault's earliest success—and it was of a literary kind—was with "London Assurance." It had neat construction, and was quite a smart imitation of the dialogue of Sheridan. Later on, when true comedy and even tolerable contre-façons of it went out of fashion, and when the theatre itself had little hold upon the fashionable of the educated world, Mr. Boucicault invented the sensation drama. "The Colleen Bawn" was perhaps the most conspicuous triumph in this method. The later work, as we said at the beginning, lacked interest; or, rather, whether wisely or unwisely, the public had by that time turned its attention to somebody else. As a manager, Mr. Boucicault had little success. As an actor, he owed something to art and much to an agreeable and variable personality. His mark upon the stage was important in its day; but it will not be permanent.

JEANNE SAMARY, who died of a typhoid fever caught at Trouville—where she was staying with the husband and children to whom the coquette of the theatre was so greatly devoted—was a niece of the Brohans—Madeleine and Augustine—and may thus fairly be said to have inherited personal charm and the genius for the theatre. But though l'hérédité counted for something in her chances, as an artist and a personality she was quite individual. She was never the echo of a voice that had charmed us in the past. At eighteen the Théâtre Français took her from the Conservatoire; and never did she leave the Maison de Molière. A pensionnaire for four years, she then became a sociétaire. We saw her first in her first brilliant success—"L'Étincelle" of M. Edouard Pailleron. Admirable in quite a different character in "Le Monde ou l'on S'ennuie," she had been selected to fill the title-part in the forthcoming "Parisienne"—a task that falls now to the lot of Mdle. Reichemberg. In pure comedy, Mdle. Samary was magnetic. The fulness and persuasiveness of her smile was of itself almost a method—yet it never became a trick. She had also—as was proved long after her success in modern comedy—much sympathetic power and a high intelligence in pathetic acting. As a representative of the robust soubrette of Molière, she had, to begin with, nothing whatever against her but the fewness of her years. Molière's soubrette, who is licensed to speak with boldness, with French openness, with French good sense, but with something divided by half a world from the modesty of the ingénue—Molière's soubrette, we say, was hardly in the first instance for Mdle. Samary, whose gleaming smile was essentially young. The talent of the actress, her decisiveness, and her personal charm—very marked during the first years of her practice—made us accept this Toinette and this Dorine; but it was always with reservation. Probably no one appeared more spontaneous—on the stage—than Mdle. Samary. It is interesting to note that in reality her effects were obtained at the cost of slow and patient effort. Hers was the art that was unsuspected, because it was so very thorough. At the same time, of course, her own fortunate and privileged personality—especially in her earlier years—was of enormous assistance to her. The private virtues of Mdle. Samary recalled those of Mme. Rose Chéri. She was esteemed universally, quite as much as a woman as an artist.

MUSIC.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

Six Songs. Words by Heine. Music by William Wallace. (Augener.) The composer who ventures to set Heine to music at once challenges comparison with the great song-writers of Germany, and must, therefore, expect to be judged by a high standard. Of the six poems in this album, four have been set by Schumann. There is a good deal of nice feeling in Mr. Wallace's songs, and the harmonies, if at times forced, are clever; but he is not strongly inspired, so that, in spite of many excellent things, the music does not always go straight to the heart. In these remarks we are alluding to Nos. 1 and 2, and 5 and 6. Nos. 3 and 4, "Ich hab' im Traum geweinet" and "Du bist wie eine Blume," are of greater merit; there is passion in the first, and charm in the second. In the latter, however, we do not like the repetition of the opening words "wie eine Blume" at the close of the stanza.

To Morning. An Eight-part Chorus, unaccompanied. By Charles H. Lloyd. (Novello.) This Chorus is well written and effective. It contains good key contrast, though perhaps the rhythm, in spite of the triplets in the E flat section, is somewhat monotonous. The music is Mendelssohnian in character.

Story's Coloured Music System. Book I., for Beginners. By E. M. Story. (George Philip & Son.) The author looks upon the ordinary Tutor as a "daily horror and nightly spectre." There is a natural tendency to paint the old system in very dark colours so as to make the new one all the more light and attractive. We are sometimes disposed to think that the difficulty of learning the stave and the ledger notes is exaggerated; but still there are dull pupils, and no doubt for such, mnemonical verses and coloured notes (the same note, whether on bass or treble stave or on their ledger lines, always preserving the same colour) will prove of great assistance. Colour is certainly a powerful factor. The new system deserves what the author asks for it—a fair trial.

Acoustics in Relation to Wind Instruments. By D. J. Blaikley. (Boosey.) These are three lectures delivered by the author at the Royal Military School of Music, Kneller Hall. He attempts nothing more than an outline of the principles underlying the construction and use of wind instruments; but as text-books on acoustics give little or no practical information, this pamphlet from the pen of one who is a recognised authority on the subject will be welcome.

The English Illustrated Magazine, 1890.

A handsome volume of upwards of 900 closely printed pages, with nearly 550 Illustrations of various sizes, bound in extra cloth, coloured edges, royal 8vo, price 8s.

The volume contains two complete Novels—

THE RING of AMASIS. By the EARL of LYTTON.
THE GLITTERING PLAIN; or, the Land of Living Men. By WILLIAM MORRIS.
 And numerous Short Stories, Poems, and Essays, by well-known Writers, with Pictures by leading Artists.

The Times says: "It is a handsome volume."

The Saturday Review says: "The annual volume of The English Illustrated Magazine sustains to the full the many attractive features that have long marked this excellent periodical. The artistic quality of the illustrations is well exemplified both by the woodcuts in the text and the admirable engravings after old masters and modern painters. The articles descriptive of famous localities or ancestral houses are, as usual, among the most notable contents of this handsome volume. In many directions the tastes of all classes of magazine readers are consulted, and the result is a volume that thoroughly deserves popularity."

The Manchester Examiner says: "It contains an enormous amount of interesting reading, embracing tales and travel sketches, papers on cricket and rowing, historical sketches, articles on social and educational questions, papers on lace-making, nail-making, &c., most of which are copiously illustrated. There is variety sufficient to suit all tastes. The magazine has long since established itself as one of our most popular serials. It would form an elegant and acceptable gift-book to either a boy or girl."

The Dublin Evening Mail says: "Of this magazine we can truly say, 'What a pleasant meeting with old friends!' The supply of general information and amusing literature is all that could be desired, while the illustrations could not be surpassed."

The Scotsman says: "It makes a beautiful book. One can pass a long time pleasantly in looking over its many varied illustrations, which maintain a high level of merit. The literature of the volume is of the best light reading that is produced nowadays. But why seek to describe a publication like this which everybody sees one month and looks for the next? The book is too early abroad to be properly a Christmas-book; but there are few books published at or for Christmas that could make a better gift-book."

LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

Fcap. 8vo, 4s. Net.

THE SHORTER POEMS of ROBERT BRIDGES.

Besides the ordinary edition at 4s. net a special edition of this collection of Mr. Bridges' lyrical poems, printed at the Oxford University Press, will be issued on hand-made paper, demy 12mo in size.

One hundred and ten copies only will be printed, and will be sold to the first applicants at 10s. each net.

THE TRAGIC MARY. By Michael FIELD.

Author of "Long Ago," "Callirhoe," "Canute the Great," &c. Small Edition, on hand-made paper, bound in brown boards, imperial 16mo, 7s. 6d. net.

Large-paper Edition, on Whatman's hand-made paper, bound in vellum, with design in gold by Mr. Selwyn Image, 60 copies only (numbered), fcap. 4to, 21s. net.

"The rhymed couplets of Restoration tragedians are immeasurably preferable as a vehicle for thought to the spasmodic and distorted language which Michael Field apparently regards as poetry."—Litæneum.

"The lines are adapted to the voice; they are, as it were, born of the vocal chords, and seem to call for utterance; they swim along in the wide currents of pensive emotion, they break over the rocks of passion, their multiple rhythms express all haste and hurry of speech. . . . Michael Field possesses power of writing for the voice over and above anyone who has lived for the last 250 years."—St. James's Gazette.

"It would be idle to pretend we have read it from beginning to end, for no one would believe us."—Speaker.

"It holds the reader bound and fascinated as tragedy should, it leaves him calm and satisfied, and that too is proper to tragedy."—Academy.

"A noteworthy contribution to literature, and one to which all those to whom poetry is dear may safely turn for deep and enduring pleasure."—Doston Herald.

PASTOR PASTORUM; or, the Schooling of the Apostles by our Lord. By the Rev. HENRY LATHAM, M.A., Master of Trinity Hall, Cambridge. Crown 8vo, 6s. 6d.

(Cambridge: DEIGHTON, BELL &amp; CO.)

"This is a very thoughtful and remarkable book. It wears, in a combination equally delightful and uncommon, the characteristics of originality and of simplicity."—Guardian.

NORTH'S LIVES of the NORTHS.

Right Hon. Francis North, Baron Guildford, the Hon. Sir Dudley North, and the Hon. and Rev. Dr. John North. Edited by A. JESSOPP, D.D. With Three Portraits. 3 vols., 3s. 6d. each.

"Dr. Jessopp has added a reprint of the autobiography of the author, which was published by him in a limited and now scarce edition a few years ago. . . . Lovers of good literature will rejoice at the appearance of a new, handy, and complete edition of so justly a famous book, and will congratulate themselves that it has found so competent and skilful an editor as Dr. Jessopp."—Times.

JOHNSON'S LIVES of the POETS.

Edited, with Notes, by Mrs. ALEXANDER NAPIER. And an Introduction by Professor J. W. HALES, M.A. 3 vols., 3s. 6d. each.

RACINE'S DRAMATIC WORKS. A

Metrical English Version, with Biographical Notice. By R. BRUCE BOSWELL, M.A. Oxon. 2 vols., 3s. 6d. each.

PASTEUR and RABIES. By Thomas

M. DOLAN, M.D. F.R.C.S., Author of "The Nature and Treatment of Hydrophobia," &c. Wide fcap. 8vo, 1s. 6d.

USED AS THE STANDARD IN THE POSTAL TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT.

LITERATURE.

"GREAT WRITERS SERIES." — Life of Nathaniel Hawthorne. By Moncure D. Conway. (Walter Scott.)

HAWTHORNE, says Mr. Conway, has had exceptionally competent biographers and editors of his papers. Against the editors of his papers there is nothing to be said; although now the existing literary executors might probably, with advantage to the world, publish further instalments of the Note-books. But surely a man of Hawthorne's rank and calibre should not have waited so long for something more adequate in the way of biography than the works of Mr. George Parsons Lathrop and Mr. Henry James. Mr. Julian Hawthorne's book is, no doubt, admirable, notwithstanding a peevish tone here and there; but we do not expect a son to write a full and final biography of his father. There was an excellent opening for Mr. Conway; and, as he had at his command "much valuable material that has never appeared," great things were to be expected of him. Unhappily, he has missed his opportunity. His book is interesting, of course—Mr. Conway can hardly help being interesting—and it is thoughtful and suggestive; but it certainly does not supply the "long felt want." As a study it is fairly good; as a biography, disappointing. The "valuable material" notwithstanding, little is related about Hawthorne that was not known. This would be of small consequence if the material already available had been used with skill. In fact, however, the narrative is disorderly and confusing. Well for the reader if he is familiar beforehand with the chief facts of Hawthorne's career in their proper sequence. A veteran writer like Mr. Conway ought not to use such phrases as: "But the thread of our narrative must be resumed," "we may anticipate a few years," "but we return now," "we have wandered too far ahead in this interlude." They indicate, only too truly, the need of a radical reconstruction of the narrative.

We have it on the authority of no less a person than Hawthorne's sister-in-law, Miss Elizabeth Peabody, that Mr. Conway is gifted with an "imaginative memory." An imaginative memory must be of value to writers of fiction, but it is a more questionable boon to those who attempt reminiscences and biographies. A curious instance of the development of this imaginative memory is furnished in the book before us. In 1882, Mr. Conway, writing of Emerson, who had then lately died, made an effective application of Hawthorne's story of "The Great Stone Face," which he likened to the Face of Puritanism. Hawthorne's tale, said Mr. Conway, "told wiser than he imagined." Eight years later we are boldly told that "it was Emerson who inspired the finest allegorical tale ever written, 'The Great Stone Face.'" Does the assertion that "Emerson had never known poverty" also come from the imaginative memory, or has Mr. Conway never heard or read the story of Emerson's early years? It is imagination free from memory, and taking a still wilder flight, which gives us Hawthorne haunted by his deceased friend Cilley, who shakes his "gory locks" at him on page 64, and by John Brown, who shakes his "gory locks" at him on page 203.

There are two unpardonable sins in the eyes of Mr. Conway—belief in eternal damnation, and disbelief in negro emancipation. From the first of these Hawthorne was free; at any rate he did not go to church. The second, however, cannot be passed over. It cannot even be smoothed down, as Mr. Conway tried to smooth it in the case of Carlyle. The fact remains that Hawthorne wrote a Life of his friend Franklin Pierce, and that this Life helped, or was believed to help, considerably in securing the election of Pierce to the Presidency. Too much, as it seems to me, is made of the incident. If Hawthorne wrote favourably of Pierce, he wrote only what he believed. Pierce was his life-long friend. There is no reason to suppose that Hawthorne ever in his heart retracted anything he had written about him. The cordial relations continued to the last. Pierce was his companion on that last sad journey when Hawthorne died. When Mrs. Pierce died, Hawthorne, although himself ill, insisted on attending the funeral. "The air was chill; and Pierce, in that moment of deep grief, was observed to turn and pull up Hawthorne's overcoat about his throat." This little incident, related by Mr. Conway, suggests the manner of man Pierce really was. Hawthorne, on his side, was equally true. When Our Old Home was published, Pierce was unpopular; but Hawthorne insisted on dedicating the book to him, saying: "If he is so exceedingly unpopular that his name is enough to sink the volume, there is so much the more need that an old friend should stand by him." From the Abolitionist point of view, the public policy of Pierce was highly mischievous; yet he appears to have acted according to his lights and to the best of his ability. The modern bigotry which condemns a man for his social opinions is quite as bad as the time-honoured bigotry about things theological. No one has done bolder service against the latter than Mr. Conway; and it is a pity he cannot bring the same free spirit to bear when he is called to judge the character of men who, like Hawthorne and Pierce, were at variance with him on the subject of negro slavery.

According to Mr. Conway, Hilda in Transformation "is a 'prophetic portrait' of Hawthorne's eldest daughter." What ground he has for this statement I do not know. He instances a few trivial resemblances; but Mr. Julian Hawthorne, who ought to know, affirmed long since with reference to the origin of Hilda that she had in her "some traits of Mrs. Hawthorne," although "Mrs. Hawthorne's was much the larger and broader nature of the two." He does not even name his sister Una in this connexion; and what is publicly known of the character and career of that gifted and noble woman seems itself to sufficiently refute the suggestion of kinship to the narrow and self-righteous Hilda.

Readers of Hawthorne can hardly fail to observe the prominence he gives to portraits and their painters. His references to them are frequent and particular. He treats them as though they possessed a profound human or superhuman significance. The great Pyncheon portrait in The House of the Seven Gables is made to conceal the missing title-deeds during all the years of the Pyncheon ascendancy, and its fall from the wall is co-incident with the healing of the breach which forms the motive of the romance. Holgrave, the photographic artist, is made to say

"There is wonderful insight in heaven's broad and simple sunshine. While we give it credit for only reflecting the merest surface, it actually brings out the secret character with a truth that no painter would ever venture upon, even could he detect it."

In "The Prophetic Pictures," one of the Twice Told Tales, the artist "paints, not merely a man's features, but his mind and heart—he catches the secret sentiments and passions, and throws them upon the canvas." Of this wonderful painter we are told that the rumour went that, after he had once got possession of a person's face and figure, he might paint him in any act or situation whatever, and the picture would be prophetic. The painter's own theory of his art, as set forth in the story, is that the true artist must look beneath the exterior. It is his gift "to see the inmost soul, and by a power indefinable even to himself, to make it glow or darken on the canvas, in glances that express the thought or sentiment of years."

Just such a painter was Hawthorne himself, only that his tools were pen and ink-stand instead of brush and palette. His method is essentially that which is here described. He is one who not merely draws the features—which, however, he does with wonderful exactness—but the mind and heart. He, too, is a painter of prophetic pictures—pictures which reveal, not indeed the future of the world of fact, but the realities of the possible. He wrought upon the transcendental principle that circumstances influence behaviour, and develop but do not radically alter character. A gifted observer, he was not contented simply to transfer to literature such facts in life as came under his observation. These served as a basis; but for the men and women whom he met in daily life he conceived some new and striking environment, and worked out the result. We may suppose that Hester Prynne might have been a fairly happy and truly devoted wife and mother, with no extraordinary experiences to record. Perhaps Hawthorne knew the original in some such aspect. But the fire which warms the hands may burn the house; and Hester, defrauded in marriage of the needed love, and finding it outside amid a community of rigid Puritans, develops into the figure of The Scarlet Letter. Clifford Pyncheon, the sensitive lover of the beautiful, created for careless, irresponsible happiness, is arrested in his growth by an almost life-long imprisonment; and in the wreck of his life we discover an infinite pathos, knowing what has been lost. The Faun in Transformation, a figure not wholly dissimilar in character, derives his development, as Hester Prynne derives hers, from sin; the one in knowledge of it, the other in participation. Powers undeveloped, or capable of a development different from the actual, were the material with which Hawthorne wrought.

The impression was at one time general that The Blithedale Romance was a chronicle or caricature of the Brook Farm Association. The Association was in Hawthorne's mind when he wrote the book, and some of the persons he saw at Brook Farm are partly reproduced. Zenobia was identified with Margaret Fuller by indignant friends. It was Margaret Fuller gravely misrepresented, they said. They paid a poor compliment to Hawthorne's art, for the differences were radical. Hawthorne denied the charge. There was, however, more to be said, and Mr. Julian Hawthorne might well have said it. But, in one of those fits of perversity which mar his otherwise admirable work, he refused. "I am in possession of indubitable evidence," he said, but he would not gratify a very legitimate curiosity. Mr. Conway, nevertheless, might have possessed himself of the facts; but he contents himself with enquiring, "what other woman [than Margaret Fuller] of such commanding power was there at Brook Farm?" The truth is that Zenobia was a composite character, evolved from Margaret Fuller and another resident at Brook Farm, Cornelia Hall, with much superadded. The resulting personage, Zenobia, possible in nature, for it is consistent in all its parts, was never, so far as Hawthorne knew, actual. For the actions of Zenobia we may look in vain in the histories of Margaret Fuller and Cornelia Hall. One of the most absolutely perfect chapters Hawthorne ever wrote—the finding of the body of Zenobia—was founded on a real experience of Hawthorne's own at Concord.

In the unfinished story of Septimus, we have an example of one of Hawthorne's stories in the making, and it seems to indicate how entirely Hawthorne always framed his work on facts. The Note-books show how precise an observer he was, and whatever he presented to the world was constructed on those observations. The author says of Septimus, "our story is an internal one, dealing as little as possible with outward events, and taking hold of these only where it cannot be helped, in order, by means of them, to delineate the history of a mind." Yet it actually is, as it stands, far more full of action and incident than any of its predecessors. Here and there the narrative is broken; something was to have been filled in—something ghostly or speculative, perhaps. If Hawthorne had lived to complete this book, it is easy to believe the framework would have been so wrought upon that, in its final shape, the story would have ranked among the most weird of his romances.

In his choice of subjects, Hawthorne was as eclectic as the artist of the story already referred to. The "sleek and comfortable visage and the gold-laced coat" did not attract him. Persons of outward grandeur figure seldom in his writings, and only as minor personages. For the most part, his people are the people of the every-day world, whom most of us would pass in the street without a second glance, but whose faces were to Hawthorne the index of something "uncommon in thought, sentiment, or experience." Hester, Hollingsworth, the Pyncheons and the Maules, although by virtue of Hawthorne's magic they did for our behoof many wondrous deeds, belonged essentially to the ordinary life of the world; and their originals were no doubt, for the most part, in the mere lives they did lead—though not in the lives which Hawthorne shows they might, under other conditions, have led—commonplace enough.

Mr. Conway's critical judgments—which, if not always correct, are worth attention—and a few personal reminiscences are the chief things of value in the present book. An adequate Life of Hawthorne has yet to appear. Let us hope Mr. Lowell's work—if it ever does come—will furnish what is needed.

WALTER LEWIN.

Old Sea Wings, Ways, and Words, in the Days of Oak and Hemp. By Robert C. Leslie. (Chapman & Hall.)

IF Mr. Frederic Harrison succeeds in carrying out his idea of constructing, for the benefit of posterity, a national strong-room in which "precious poems" are to be sealed up with models of ironclads, Mr. Irving in "Hamlet," and other samples of the representative products of the age, he would do well to include a copy of Mr. Leslie's treatise on The Days of Oak and Hemp, which makes its welcome appearance not a day too soon, and is even now a most interesting connecting link with the past. For, as Mr. Leslie truly observes, the nautical antiquary of the present day has very little in the shape of ruin (restored or otherwise) to help him in the study of the sea-castles, homes, and ways of the men whose business was upon the great waters of old; and we know to-day rather more about the structure of some pre-Adamite oyster, or the wings of an extinct lizard, than we do of the build and rig of those ships of Tarshish and others spoken of in the Bible, which seem to have been making regular over-sea voyages even before the days of King Solomon. It is indeed historically rather the fashion to think that the arts of naval architecture, navigation, and seamanship leapt suddenly into comparative perfection towards the close of the fifteenth century; and we are constantly asked to accept, as a portrait of a fourteenth-century ship, some such quaint old nondescript manuscript or heraldic craft as that which figures in the arms of the city of Paris. But the more carefully the subject is considered, the more certain does it appear that sea-life in the Middle Ages, and before them, could not have been so far behind life ashore as we are apt to think it was.

"Before the introduction of steam, and iron shipbuilding, nothing connected with the great conservative sea or its service moved in leaps or bounds; and the evolution of a sea-going ship, even of the Elizabethan period, with all her complication of masts, sails, and tackling, must have required a longer time for its development than has elapsed since the days of the Armada."

Unfortunately, there are few records of sails and rigging of value earlier than the fifteenth century; and we are chiefly indebted for even the little we do know of such matters before then to the work of nuns and monks, who naturally had but little practical knowledge of ships and their rigging, and, like a modern land artist, were able only to give us feeble impressions of vessels as they appeared to their un instructed vision. And, judging from the fact that we have, as Mr. Leslie shows, many old-world craft yet with us, even in England, such, for instance, as the Thames sailing-barge, which are able, in spite of steam, to hold their own and fulfil their original purpose under sail, though they have altered little in build or rig for three or four centuries, it is only fair to infer that vessels so well contrived did not arrive at something very like perfection in a day. Probably we need not go farther back than the present single-square-sailed coaster of Norway for a true picture of the smaller square-rigged vessels of the thirteenth century or even earlier.

Mr. Leslie's chief object, however, is not so much to speculate about prehistoric shipping and its seamen, as "to try to record, or hold on to, some of the forms, rigs, and ways of shipping recently passed away, or which, though still remaining among us, are rapidly doing so." In this, it may at once be said, he has been entirely successful; and what he modestly calls a "few facts" is in reality a veritable mine of curious and useful information. He has also a rich fund of anecdote, the briny flavour of which is as unmistakable as it is refreshing. Here is one illustrating the partiality of the old seamen for a certain dish—

"It used to be related by an ancient waiter of the old Quebec Hotel, Portsmouth, that upon a certain memorable day, years ago, three brothers—all skippers of ships then wind-bound at Spithead—met, and agreed to dine together, the dinner to consist only of three dishes ordered independently by each captain. On removing the covers, three smoking legs of boiled pork graced the table."

In the days when voyages were measured in months and weeks instead of days and hours, they were not always looked upon as "imprisonment with a chance of being drowned," but as another form of life, to be enjoyed and made as pleasant as possible while it lasted, as witness the testimony of Dr. John Fryer, who wrote on his return from India in 1682 that "though a tedious voyage of seven months, it passed away merrily, with good wine, and no bad musick; but the life of all good company, and an honest commander, who fed us with fresh provisions of turkies, geese, ducks, hens, sucking pigs, sheep, goats, &c. . . and, to crown all, the day we made England, kill'd us a fatted calf, so that you may spare that welcome when you receive yours," &c.

Coming down to later times, Mr. Leslie gives a very interesting sketch of the Atlantic passage 150 years back, and of life on board the Black X. liners, the last of the ocean sailing-packets. This may be commended to the attention of those steerage and even second-class passengers who "are apt to growl to-day over the bad accommodation allotted to them on board a modern two-thousand ton steamship, and even write grumbling letters to the Times, in which they describe discomforts, &c., which read like the height of comfort, cleanliness, and luxury, to any one old enough to have made a steerage passage across the Atlantic fifty years ago, when a steerage passenger's fare to New York by sailing-packet was five pounds, and find yourself in everything except fire and water."

The Black X. liners carried no regular surgeon or doctor; and unless one turned up by chance among the passengers, this duty in the steerage fell upon the carpenter, who seems to have been as versatile as he was ubiquitous, and who dispensed all medicines required by this class of passengers.

"They were served out to him from the ship's medicine-chest aft by the black steward, according to the first mate's advice; an old, but very large "Dictionary of Domestic Medicine" being consulted in doubtful cases. Generally speaking, the carpenter was also the ship's dentist."

"The Pilot" has a chapter all to himself, and a very chatty and amusing disquisition it is. One old pilot, speaking of his fare on board a Spaniard, which was chiefly remarkable for the strong flavour and liberal use of oils and garlicks, wound up his yarn almost in the words of Mrs. Gamp—"But the drinks was all good." Like some other professional men, as they advance in life, pilots often become confirmed pessimists respecting weather. Mr. Leslie tells us of a well-known Channel pilot of whom it is related that, after he was sixty, he never answered a captain's greeting of "Well, pilot, what d'ye think of the weather?" in any other form than "Well, captain, I consider it looks werry inferior—werry inferior indeed."

The chapters devoted to sails, or "seawings," are particularly interesting and instructive, and are brimming over with quaint sea lore and really valuable and useful information. While he was engaged upon them, the author received from Mr. Ruskin, who took a warm interest in the work,

"a wonderful model, four feet in length, of the primary quill of a kestrel hawk's wing; by striking the air with which 'one learnt,' he said, 'practically more about, and realised better, the actual propulsive force of a wing, or of a well-set fore-and-aft sail, than in any other way;' for, in waving it even slowly through the air, this model feather seemed to lift, or, as a sailor would say, 'take charge' of your whole arm and hand."

There is also much food for reflection in the chapter on "the wingless war-ship of the future, and those in charge of her;" and some very suggestive recent extracts from the logs of merchant steamers are given, "to prove the necessity of giving those who command and man our modern half-tide rock class of war-ships some reserve form of wing or sail power, and some knowledge of how to make use of it." The concluding chapter contains an alphabetically arranged list of sea terms, some of which, though obsolete as to their meaning afloat, are still used ashore; and a clear understanding of the text is aided throughout by no less than 135 illustrations by the author. The book will prove of permanent value alike to the nautical antiquary, the naval historian, the practical seaman, and, in an almost equal degree, to the marine painter.

GEORGE T. TEMPLE.

TWO BOOKS ON ISAIAH.

Biblical Commentary on the Prophecies of Isaiah.

By Franz Delitzsch. Translated from the Fourth Edition. With an Introduction by Prof. S. R. Driver. Vol. I. (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark.)

The Prophecies of the Captivity (Isaiah xl.-lxvi.). By R. Travers Herford. (Sunday School Association.)

STUDENTS of Isaiah will greet so early a translation of Delitzsch's Isaiah. I cannot do otherwise than notice it briefly, although it is not a year since I reviewed the original work, then fresh from the press. The names of the translators, Messrs. Kennedy, Hastie, and Bickerton, are a guarantee of the substantial accuracy of this work. I am not prepared to pledge myself to its immaculateness, but believe it to be generally trustworthy. The shortness of the interval between the publication of the original and that of the translation excuses the somewhat wooden English. It is unnecessary to add much as to the utility of this book. To have brought his commentary so nearly up to date, and to have adapted it in the main to his changed critical views, is no small achievement of the venerated author. Dillmann's still more recent admirable commentary in the Exegetisches Handbuch by no means renders this book superfluous. Prefixed to it is an interesting critical sketch by Prof. Driver, which will be a useful guide to students not only of this but of the other works of the accomplished author. It may be compared with a beautiful biographical sketch of Delitzsch by Prof. Kauffmann in the Jewish Quarterly Review for July, 1890, which is, if I may say so, incidentally not less descriptive of the best modern Judaism than of the wide-hearted even if peculiar Christianity of Delitzsch. It is delightful to see the unanimity of the Christian world in honouring the memory of this veteran Biblical scholar (see review of this work in the Guardian, Sept. 12, 1890), and not less so to mark that a "palm-branch from Judah" is among the offerings at his grave. The translators have happily spared us those many "additional notes" which used to meet us in publications like the present. But on p. 377 they point out, on Prof. Driver's authority, an unintentional misrepresentation of this respected scholar's view (Isaiah: his Life and Times, p. 127) of the prediction of a Babylonian captivity ascribed to Isaiah in the narrative which closes the first half of our Book of Isaiah. I confess that I regret this correction, which seems to involve the reassertion of a difficult theory. I would rather that Prof. Driver had waited till he could give his own work on Isaiah (so scholarly and within its limits so progressive) a thoroughly impartial revision, and could consider whether it were wise to adhere to the view which he has adopted. Dr. G. A. Smith and myself are also criticised in that passage of Delitzsch. The former ("Expositor's Bible": Isaiah I. 202) speaks with more reserve than I was myself able to do. Yet Delitzsch felt so warmly on the subject of this reported prophecy of Isaiah that he drew special attention to Dr. Smith's supposed delinquency in the Expositor, in 1888. It was easy to answer Delitzsch; and he was in fact answered, if I remember right, in the ACADEMY.

Of Mr. Herford's little book, an appreciative word may be said. Though not so designed, it is a useful supplement to Prof. Sayce's The Life and Times of Isaiah (Religious Tract Society, 1889), a delightful but most provoking book, already noticed in the ACADEMY. In 184 small pages, Mr. Herford gives a clear and instructive, though somewhat dry and in a certain sense superficial, comment on the Revised Version of Isaiah xl.-lxvi., with a brief introduction on the historical groundwork, the forms and contents of the prophecies, the Servant of Yahveh, and age, and authorship. Mr. Herford accepts the plurality of the authorship, and refers for further evidence to Prof. Driver's Isaiah. Interspersed are several very suggestive critical notes; see especially that on Isaiah lxiii. 18, lxiv. 11, upon which I would only ask whether the temple was really burned down under Artaxerxes III. The treatment of the difficult questions connected with the "Servant" is well worth the attention even of the advanced student—notice the acute remark on Isaiah xlix. 8 (cf. p. 28, note<sup>1</sup>). In general, Mr. Herford's critical tendency is judiciously conservative; he remembers the untrained students for whom he is writing, and does not seek to move too much in advance of the times.

T. K. CHEYNE.

On Viol and Flute. By Edmund Gosse. (Kegan Paul & Co.)

THIS volume, we are told, "contains all that the author desires to preserve of such of his verses as were published, up to the year 1879, in certain volumes, all of which are now out of print." The selection has been made, for the most part, from the original 1873 volume, and the later New Poems. There are also two or three songs from "King Erik" and "The Unknown Lover." Thus in this and the "Firdausi in Exile" volume Mr. Gosse has gathered his past into barns, and his fields lie open for the future harvest. And thus such as delight to "place" their men have the material before them by which, up to the present time, the poet himself is evidently content to stand or fall, while those inspired with the spirit of literary prophecy may work out their predictions therefrom of Mr. Gosse's "rich to-come."

While intending to do neither, I will venture to say that these two volumes should serve to dissipate an error of popular classification which continues to confound together the poetical work of Mr. Dobson, Mr. Lang, and Mr. Gosse. They have, of course, much in common; they have "imitated" Ronsard together; have each loved Provence, with its

"Subtle wind that blows Through coverts of the impenetrable rose;"
have written poetical epistles after the Georgian model, peppered with fit capitals and due italics; they have all at one time or another come under the influence of Rossetti's "citherns and citoles." But then that is fast becoming "long ago," and their differentiation ought by this time to be sufficiently manifest. My concern here is with neither Mr. Dobson nor Mr. Lang; but the differentiation from both in the case of Mr. Gosse will probably be found in the fact that he is more a singer and less an artist than either—certainly less an artist than Mr. Dobson. Of the three he is the one most likely to fill a larger canvas, for Mr. Lang evidently wishes to be reckoned as "a singer who sings no more," and who would lose Mr. Dobson's garden songs for any epic possibility. Much as I admire "King Erik," I hardly think Mr. Gosse's future development will lie in drama—but this is verging on the prophetic; nor is the one considerable poem that, to my mind, inspires "the larger hope" found in the present volume, it being, indeed, "Firdausi in Exile." I remember being surprised at the comparatively slight regard paid to this really fine poem on the publication of the volume. All the critics seemed to forget it in wonder at "The Isles of the Blest," mainly, too, because the latter was written in Spenserians, apparently deeming that form a quite unattainable tour de force. As a matter of fact, however, that poem will not bear a moment's comparison with "Firdausi" in any quality of poetic power. Any one verse of "Firdausi" is worth its whole bulk; certainly those two beautiful closing verses, where, after the young man's fine satire, an older man speaks—

"And so the young man ceased; but one arose Of graver aspect, not less sad than he.
'Nay, let,' he cried, 'the sunshine and the snows
His glittering gold and silk-soft raiment be;
Approach not with unhallowed steps profane
The low white wall, the shadowy lotus-tree;
Nor let a music louder than the rain
Disturb him dreaming through eternity.
'For him no more the dawn will break in blood,
No more the silver moon bring fear by night;
He starts no longer at a tyrant's mood,
Serene for ever in the Prophet's sight;
The soul of Yaman breathed on him from heaven,
And he is victor in the unequal fight;
To Mahmoud rage and deep remorse are given,
To old Firdausi rest and long delight.'"

There are few more striking first verses either than that which tells how God

"In the proud breast of Mahmoud had begun
To stir remorse, and, like the loud typhoon, Shame blew his thoughts in gusts about his soul;"

while as a whole the poem is dignified in conception and full of noble music. May Mr. Gosse write us more like it!

There is none of quite the same calibre in the present volume, as indeed one had no right to expect, for its well-known title plainly enough refers to the more lyrical side of Mr. Gosse's powers, though this present On Viol and Flute is strikingly more distinctive in note than that of 1873. The infusion of the robust New Poems of six years later makes itself strongly felt, assisted by the suppression of some of the more languorous 1873 poems, which speaks well for Mr. Gosse's powers of self-criticism. Indeed, his selection is most happy. I hardly think there is anything of importance that one misses, while there is much that one welcomes again; and, as a whole, the volume is the individual utterance of a poet with a thoroughly English voice.

The Provençal fragrance still clings, of course, here and there; but it might be English sweetbriar, not the heavy scent of earlier influences. There are examples of the "Gallic bonds," the famous sestina, the chant royal to Bacchus, and this tender little villanelle—

"Little mistress mine, good-bye!
I have been your sparrow true;
Dig my grave for I must die.
Waste no tear, and heave no sigh;
Life should still be blithe for you,
Little mistress mine, good-bye!
In your garden let me lie,
Underneath the pointed yew
Dig my grave, for I must die.
We have loved the quiet sky
With its tender arch of blue;
Little mistress mine, good-bye!
That I still may feel you nigh,
In your virgin bosom, too,
Dig my grave, for I must die.
Let our garden friends that fly
Be the mourners, fit and fow.
Little mistress mine, good-bye!
Dig my grave, for I must die."

There is also that sequence of poems in sonnets, and that curious orchidaceous form, the Sicilian octave, which struck quite the most spontaneous note in the 1873 volume—"Fortunate Love."

"Oh! be not, my desire, so wholly saint,
That I must woo thee to the rhythm of hymns!"
were two lines one could not well forget; or this sonnet, especially the sestet—"Canst thou not wait for Love one flying hour,

O heart of little faith? Are fields not green
Because their rolling bounty is not seen?
Will beauty not return with the new flower,
Because the tired sun seeks the deep sea-bower,
Where sleep and Tethys tenderly convene,
While purple night unfurls her starry screen?
Shall sunlight no more thrill the world with power?"

True Love is patient ever; by the brooks
He hath his winter-dreams, a fluent choir,
And waits for summer to revive again;
He knows that by-and-by the woodland-nooks
Will overflow with blossoming green fire,
And swooping swallows herald the warm rain."

"To Henrik Ibsen in Dresden" reminds one how long Mr. Gosse has been faithful to those "great anathemas of song sent northward from the South" which have lately been setting us by the ears. One is a little afraid that his poem still remains unfulfilled prophecy, and

"the weight of insular phlegmatic pride"

no less than in 1872. One wonders who is right.

Then, among so many more, it is good to meet again with "The Whitethroat," "Lying in the Grass," "The Farm," and

"Greece and England," all as English as our fields at haytime. The latter asks with much forcible simplicity and sweetness a question the world will, I suppose, go on asking itself to the end:—

"Would this sunshine be completer,
Or these violets smell sweeter,
Or the birds sing more in metre,
If it all were years ago,
When the melted mountain-snow,
Heard in Enna all the woe
Of the poor forlorn Demeter?"

Were the brown-limbed lovers bolder?
Venus younger, Cupid older?
Down the wood-nymph's warm white shoulder
Trailed a purpler, madder vine?
Were the poets more divine?
Brew me no such golden wine
Here, where summer suns are colder?"

As to how Mr. Gosse answers the question, those who do not remember had better buy this volume. Of the songs herein, I hardly think there is one quite as good as that in the "Firdausi" volume to which Mr. Thomas Hardy has recently given a double chance of fame—"If I forget," but the "Serenade" and "There's a sleek thrush sits in the apple-tree" are very charming.

I cannot leave Mr. Gosse without making one more quotation, that of the verses which formed the proem of New Poems, and stand as epilogue in the present volume. A comparison with his earlier "Ad Auditorem" speaks well for the strengthening influence of his Northern Studies. One unfortunate transposition in the sixth line of the second verse, where the text reads "dumb and blind," instead of "blind and dumb," should be noted for emendation in a new edition.

"If thou disdain the sacred muse,
Beware lest Nature, past recall,
Indignant at that crime, refuse
Thee entrance to her audience-hall;
Beware lest sea, and sky, and all
That bears reflection of her face
Be blotted with a hueless pall
Of unilluminated commonplace."

"The moving heavens, in rhythmic time,
Roll, if thou watch them or refrain;
The waves upon the shore in rhyme
Beat, heedless of thy loss or gain:
Not they, but thou, hast lived in vain,
If thou art deaf and blind and dumb,
Parched in the heart of morning rain,
And on the flaming altar numb."

"Ah! desolate hour when that shall be,
When dew and sunlight, rain and wind,
Shall seem but trivial things to thee,
Unloved, unheeded, undivined:
Nay, rather let that morning find
Thy molten soul exhaled and gone,
Than in a living death resigned
So darkly still to labour on."

As one comes to this last verse a sheet of tissue paper half reveals and half conceals a most charming tail-piece by Mr. Hamo Thornycroft, wherein a naked young shepherd is fluting happily to a young maid who sits at his feet, resting her head against his knee with all the unthinking innocence of Greek art. This, and a delicate frontispiece of a woman flute-player by Mr. Alma Tadema, add no little to the dainty ensemble of this latest addition to the publishers' fitly-named "Elzevir" series. But good poetry needs no Chiswick Press; and however printed and wherewithal it should be clothed, Mr. Gosse's verse must always be acceptable. Whether or not he fulfil the promise of "Firdausi," and "through bronzed lyre in tragic order go," one hopes he will still, when the mood is upon him, take his "flute among the prim-roses."

RICHARD LE GALLIENNE.

A SPANISH HISTORY OF COMMUNAL PROPERTY.

Historia de la Propiedad Comunal. Por Rafael Altamira y Crevea. (Madrid.)

THIS work is a worthy complement to the Ensayo sobre la Historia de la Propiedad Territorial en España, by F. de Cardenas (Madrid, 1873), and to de Azcarate's Historia del Derecho de Propiedad y su Estado Actual en Europa (Madrid, 1879-1883). It differs from those works in the fact that Senor Altamira has clearly seen that a history of communal property is something quite distinct from a history of the laws, or of the legislation on communal property. In fact, the two are often opposed: the legislation constantly ignores, and is often in direct contradiction to, the actual uses and tenures of communal property; and when it notices these, it describes them often under false and fictitious terms. In spite of the legislature, these still maintain themselves, and are not really abrogated by the later enactments of jurists, kings, or parliaments. The history of communal property has to be written from quite another point of view. It is almost a department of archaeology. In a large part of Europe it is almost a history of survivals. And there is besides a peculiar disturbing element in the history of communal property in southern and western continental Europe. Though it is easy to see traces, and the influence of it, in the early history of Rome, and of her agrarian laws, yet the later Roman legislation, and the legislations founded on it, with their fictitious personae, have done more to obscure the history and the origin of communal property than anything else.

I can only allude to the different forms of early communal property and its periodical distributions, pastoral, agricultural, and industrial; its various stages, the patriarchal, the family developing later into the house community, the tribal, the servile, the village, and later religious communities described in these pages. The outcome of the whole to most readers will be, I think, surprise at the comparatively late date at which real property came to be considered the exclusive property of the individual, and in how many districts and cases, even in Western Europe, real communal property has survived as the sole holding in a community down almost to the present day. This is true, in later times at least, of real property only. Very early a practical distinction was made in agricultural communities between movable personal property, such as the clothes, ornaments, and minor tools belonging to the individual, the peculium which might be gained while living in the community, and the dowry, and the house and the land, and the chief tools and furniture, which belonged to the community alone and were indivisible and inseparable from it. Our author rightly distinguishes between real communal property and all forms of co-operation, or mere collective property, or distribution of the profits or usufruct, so much practised and advocated at present. In the early stages of communal property, when property could be held only by the tribe, village, community, or house, there was no idea of the possibility of sale at all. There was no thought of anyone who could buy, for no one had the power to sell. The very entrance of this idea marks the beginning of the end. Even in the survivals of this stage, in Spain, France, or elsewhere, one of the marked features of such communities is the hostility to the stranger—i.e., to one not belonging to the community, whose interest would be to purchase or acquire for himself at the expense of the community; whereas in all modern forms of co-operation, distribution of joint-profits, limited liability, &c., the power of sale, the possibility of dissolution, the freedom in making or terminating the compact is ever present. So, on the other hand, real communal property must be distinguished from property held by a corporation, civil or religious, and especially from the latter. The revenue of the real property of a village community, or of a municipality, employed (as was often the case until recent times) for equal or proportional distribution, or for paying the taxes or contributions of the whole community and of individuals in it, may be considered as collective property; but this is hardly the case with a religious corporation. Our author discusses the question whether the early tendencies of Christianity were really communistic or no, and does not give a definite decision thereon; but he rightly observes that the fundamental idea of the religious Christian brotherhood or sisterhood, living together in community, neither the corporation nor the individuals holding any real or personal property at all, is utterly opposed to that either of the tribal, village, family, or house community, holding their real property in common, and with periodical distribution for the benefit of all. As cited from M. Sudre, "The object of the common life of the monks is not material enjoyment"; but the object, and often the result, of communal tenure of property is to obtain or increase those enjoyments. "To forget one's father and mother, to isolate oneself from the family, to forego marriage is the condition of the more perfect life"; to develop and bind together family life, to exalt the fatherhood or motherhood, to give the matron a higher place than the virgin, are the conditions and objects of the village, family, and house communities. A clear statement of this difference of aims seems necessary now when so many semi-religious, philanthropic, and humanitarian projects are on foot to revive a kind of communistic or collective property, without any exact perception of the ends for which the revival is sought, or the results to be obtained. Unless this is clearly comprehended, a diffusion of and playing with a merely sentimental communism and socialism may be even more disastrous to present society than the sentimental adoption by the higher classes of the doctrines of Fénelon, B. St. Pierre, and Rousseau, and the rights of man were to the French society of the Ancien Régime. To make the State the universal landlord is no true communism, but rather the exaggeration and concentration of property under one individual.

The mention of the French Revolution brings me to a point on which, under correction, I somewhat differ with our author. He dates the introduction of the rigid theory of individual property, and of the legislation opposed to communal and collective property, from the French Revolution. In my opinion it began long before; it always underlay the Roman law. Although we find a recognition of communal property and of communal pasturage in the legislation of Justinian, still these were treated as exceptional cases; the tendency of the whole legislation was to abolish them. So, too, though feudalism in its centrifugal force did act in many cases as a local preservative, yet its spirit was antagonistic. The English Enclosure Acts, and even some similar Spanish legislation, date from mediæval times, and consequently long before 1789. On the other hand, I think that hardly enough stress is laid on the real, though indirect, influence of the Reformation and its doctrines on the question of individual property. Religion in early times was rather a family and corporate or state institution than an individual relation. It continued to be so, to a certain extent, in the Eastern and Western Churches. But the Reformation was in one aspect a revolt against the idea of salvation through a corporation or community; God and the individual soul were made everything. This individualism, outside of religion, acted unconsciously on the ideas of property also. The Reformation greatly strengthened family life; but it was that of the individual family only, of each household apart, not of the family as a unity in a larger community. It is difficult to say how much this feeling gave birth to the peculiar sacredness which has been attached to the rights of individual property in later ages. Certainly it does not seem to have existed in anything like the same degree before. The older religion of the Lar and of the hearth is quite distinct, and its tendencies apart.

Our author, like many another student of modern jurisprudence, holds that the legislation of the French Revolution, and all other legislations founded on it, have gone too far in their maintenance of the rights of the individual against all forms of collective, corporate, and communal real property. The question seems to be one rather of political economy than of strict law. If we take the old definition of political economy as the science of the production and distribution of wealth, we notice that economists, as a rule and practically, have laid their whole stress on the former, and legislators have followed them; while they have neglected the latter, and have almost taken it for granted as a necessary result. But the study of the history of real property seems undoubtedly to show that, while under individual tenure and competition the production of wealth is generally greater, still under any favourable circumstances the distribution of the wealth produced has been more equable (as would be the logical inference), and better done for the interests of the whole community, when real property is wholly or partially collective or communal than when wholly individual. In such communities there are few very much richer than their neighbours, there are few in deep poverty; pauperism is unknown; the whole community may suffer from some temporary crisis, but the burden of suffering does not fall so unequally on the individuals. Against this must be set its necessary exclusive character; only the members of the community can share these advantages, to throw them open to all the world is to destroy the community. The problems are how to secure the greater production of wealth which comes from individualism; how to escape the evils of the concentration of capital in a few hands; and how to ensure the more equal distribution which prevails when real property is wholly or partially held in common.

To descend to a detail. I am never quite able to understand why the institution of the cheptel, i.e., the leasing of cattle on a system of joint profits, has never obtained in England. Senor Altamira shows that it is very old, and widely spread. Supplemented, as it usually is, by a system of cattle insurance, it is a fairly safe mode of small investment, and is the soundest help to a rising labourer or peasant farmer with small capital. I resist the temptation to add one or two more instances of survival to those quoted by Senor Altamira, but I must quote the instance which he takes from Pella's Historia del Ampurdan, vol. viii. There are villages in the mountain district of the Ampurdan where the whole land still (1885) belongs to the community, and only the dwelling-houses belong to families or individuals. I may mention, too, what is now (1889-90) going on in the commune from which I write. Owing to the total destruction from disease of the chestnut trees held in various usufruct tenures, and belonging to individuals, though planted on communal lands, these now unoccupied lands are being themselves enclosed and taken into private cultivation, in spite of their being customary immemorial communal property, and will doubtless henceforth be held as ordinary real property under the civil law of France. Thus it is that tenures die out without leaving a trace of the change in written legislation; and facts such as this show the interest and the necessity of a history of communal property such as is here given us.

NEW NOVELS.

Sons and Daughters. By Mrs. Oliphant. (Blackwood.)

A Willing Exile. In 2 vols. By Mark A. Raffalovich. (White.)

Love and Mirage. By M. Betham Edwards. (Hutchison.)

Name and Fame. By A. S. Ewing Lester and Adeline Sergeant. In 3 vols. (Bentley.)

Sliding Sands. By Henry Cresswell. In 3 vols. (Hurst & Blackett.)

All for Naught. By Wilfrid Woollam. In 3 vols. (Hurst & Blackett.)

MRS. OLIPHANT'S Sons and Daughters is one of the cleverest though one of the slightest books that even she, given as she is to the combination of cleverness and slightness, has produced for a long time. Indeed, it is so clever that even the ferocious critic may forgive its slightness, albeit he may think that it would have paid for expansion and elaboration. There are practically only four characters—a very strict limitation might cut them down to two. The complete dramatis personae, omitting the merest supers, consist of Mr. Burton and Mr. Thursley, British merchants (not quite drawn from the life), and their only children, Gervase Burton and Madeline Thursley. Gervase Burton is the crowning example of Mrs. Oliphant's satire—a satire which, if she had only been a little less prolific and a little more painstaking, might have ranked with very great examples—on the young man of the day and recent days. Gervase is a distinctly good young man of his kind. He is very fond of his Madeline, has compunctious yearnings towards his father, is high-minded, scrupulous, philanthropic. But even in his philanthropy the gospel-question of the second half of the nineteenth century, "What is thy duty to thyself?" pursues him. He refuses to go into his father's business; actually stains his father's memory after the business is ruined (by the way, there is a book called Rob Roy) by a clumsy piece of self-sacrifice; acquiesces in, or rather grasps at, an idle life, practically on Madeline's money; and (an inimitable touch which makes us forgive Mrs. Oliphant for many scamped volumes) owes her a grudge when he finds that it is to herself that he owes her. Delivering a grave and chaste judgment, we should say that Tom Jones and even Peregrine Pickle, rascal as he was, will be saved while Gervase Burton lies howling. But he is, if not exactly réçu, observed at least; and he will save Mrs. Oliphant many years on the doleful mount. As for Madeline, we see only her good side here; if she had no other, Griselda was a rag-doll to her, and anyhow she is quite charming. We make our compliment to Mrs. Oliphant, even though the book wants much working up.

We cannot make our compliment to Mr. Raffalovich. His heroine, Daisy Brome, née Laylham, has a certain quality of "niceness" about her; but she is surrounded by doleful creatures of a world which, as a world, fortunately does not exist, never did, and never will, except in the imagination of writers for rather inferior society papers. Her passion for what one of her French analogues would call "a beautiful adored male" other than her husband, though it is limited to unlimited kissing, and observes the rule that Laylham women must be "straight," is as little passionate and as purely uninteresting as anything can be, except the beautiful adored male himself, one Clarence Holford. The husband, Cyprian Brome, is a pestilent kind of little beast, whom Mr. Raffalovich seems to have been afraid to describe fully. His friends of the infinite Christian names (and of nothing else Christian about them) are uncomely shadows, and the women of the story are as bad. Indeed, we can hardly call it a story; for it oscillates between American aimlessness and French "suggestiveness," and we have Daisy, at about four-and-twenty, acting as nurse to a husband and a lover, both of whom have softening of the brain. Let us trust (we really do not know whether the wish is moral or not) that somebody turned up as a number three who was a gentleman, who had not softening of the brain, and who had the luck to survive or the pluck to strangle Clarence and Cyprian. For Mr. Raffalovich (though not when he fancies that "did not have much money" is English) can write now and then; and his Daisy, though something of a muddled Daisy, has a little of the douceness of the true Marguerite.

Miss Betham Edwards's Love and Mirage describes the fortunes of a young Englishman in a sort of enchanted island of northern seas, which appears to be Rugen. He and his brother meet and fraternise with two specimens, Elizabeth and Flora Blume, of the Süßes Mägdlein, not "mit weinglas in their paw," as Mr. Leland has pleasantly sung. The younger brother and the younger sister go the way of man and maid quite in the orthodox and agreeable manner, but not so Arthur Venning and Elizabeth. Finding in her a mixture of openness and amiability, together with a singular apparent desire for vengeance on some one of his sex, and an apparently inextinguishable sorrow for a dead sister, he altogether misinterprets the riddle. Meanwhile, he makes the acquaintance of a mysterious and exquisitely beautiful but forlorn lady on the same island. No further light shall we throw on these passages. The book is written in a rather high key; and the hero (as, indeed, the author seems partly to perceive) is something both of a coxcomb and of a prig, while the end is charged with unnecessary misery, very much as not too skilful cooks sometimes overseason a sauce, being unable to temper it discreetly. But it is a pretty book of its kind. The two girls are agreeable, and some of the descriptions very happy. Miss Betham Edwards's social philosophy is, however, a little shaky. She bids us be comforted (which we decline to be, by the way, but that is neither here nor there) for the disappearance of local peasant costumes, &c., and the diffusion of tall hats, frock coats, and milliners' bonnets, because when all the world is clothed like ladies and gentlemen, "all the world will strive after the ideal contained in the words, not the least feature of which is decorum and gentleness in speech and behaviour." What polyp has greater vitality than a fallacy? Did Miss Betham Edwards ever reflect that when all are ladies and gentlemen there will be no ladies and gentlemen? that you cannot annihilate differentia and yet keep species? But to bring logic among ladies is a most dreadful thing, and we apologise for it.

The work which appears under the joint signature of A. S. Ewing Lester and Adeline Sergeant is not unworthy of that member of the pair whom we have met before, though its merits are of a kind growing more and more common, and likely to do so while the present style of novel-writing lasts. They consist in the more or less deft handling, not merely of old materials—all materials are old—but of materials already to some extent familiar in the same combinations. The clever, selfish youth, who unconcernedly beggars his father to help his own way in the world, and condemns his sister's aspirations as much from unacknowledged wish not to have a rival in her as for any other reason; the sister gifted and self-sacrificing; the interesting artist who has made an unhappy marriage; his wife, of the stage Frenchwoman class, reappearing to blackmail her husband and make him miserable; the damsel of the Hetty Sorel or Little Em'ly style—we can take off our hats to all of these, like the polite French satirist. But they are very well worked up here, and the authors have an agreeable habit of laying down the law which will edify the guileless and should conciliate the good-natured. "Few men," say they, "with vigorous and original minds can endure beyond a year or two of political leader-writing." Who will be so rash as to protest against this at the evident risk of writing himself down not a man of vigorous and original mind? Not we; and, indeed, it is all the less necessary to make any protest at all in that Name and Fame is a very agreeable book, and that we shall not be sorry to see the same names and fames on the back of another.

Mr. Cresswell's Sliding Sands might be more appropriately entitled "The Story of a Country Newspaper Office." We do not quite know why it is, but stories about newspaper offices always have a certain air of unreality to persons actually acquainted with Satan's invisible world displayed. Mr. Cresswell's, however, is less unreal than usual; and his story has, as most of his stories have had, a certain liveliness and "go" which redeems not very good dialogue, indistinct character, and French so dubious as "un journaliste [sic] Parisien." Orlando Osbaldistone (a man with such a name ought to have known that he was fit for nothing but a music-hall singer) is the gifted but weak acting-editor of a provincial paper, which belongs to, and is still really edited by, a semi-benevolent old tyrant and invalid. Osbaldistone has married, much in the same circumstances as the hero of Crabbe's most famous piece of verse, a perfectly uninteresting young woman. A beautiful and gifted maiden, Vera Meredith, knocks him off his balance, and after a time he disappears, the paper (after nearly falling into the hands of an unprincipled novelist, who has made capital out of his wife's grave) passing into the control of a chivalrous leader-writer, who has once refused his friend Osbaldistone's succession, and who is Vera Meredith's cousin. The old tyrant Forman is rather good, and so is Osbaldistone in parts; but he is as clumsy and craven as he is illegal in love; and we fear that, as he took all his money away with him, leaving nothing for the wife, who, unsatisfactory as she was, had been very badly treated by him and had treated him well, he was not good for much. The other characters are something shadowy, but the misfortunes of an earwiggling interviewer named Green please the equal mind.

All for Naught, by William Woollam, has at least this merit, that it is not like other books. As a story, it can hardly receive much praise; for the plot is excessively involved, without any particular reason or advantage, and the characters are eccentric to the verge of lunacy. One of the heroes, Maurice Miles, a villain for the sake of villainy, is neither attractive nor impressive, nor, indeed, intelligible. His real father, Henry Oldfield, behaves more unintelligibly still, and is grossly cruel and unjust at his death to his adopted children (really step-children, and cousins by marriage) to whom he has all their lives shown deep affection. His friend Mr. Sharely, intended for an amiable, but quaint, clergyman, is introduced in the most equivocal circumstances, assists in blackmailing, and winks at worse things. As for the heroine, Di Kennedy, alias Violet Vernon, alias The Chancellor, the author has no doubt intended to make her eccentric and emancipated, and therein he has succeeded. But he has also made her partly (not wholly) unladylike, and partly something worse. A young woman who, on her first meeting with a young man, kisses flowers "on both sides," and gives them to him because he is a "real poet" (he is an undergraduate, and has written some lines in the Cambridge Review), and who, at about their third or fourth meeting, lays herself out in more senses than one to be kissed, is a very agreeable companion, no doubt; but her manners may be said to approach those of the class politely called in another tongue "beautiful littles." George Oldfield did not kiss her and did ask her to marry him. Perhaps it would have been wiser to reverse the proceeding; for her conduct is in other ways more remarkable than suited to inspire that confidence which is the most excellent thing in marriage. She appears not to have been consciously "improper" at all, nor was Vera Meredith, in Mr. Cresswell's book, who, indeed, repels with quite melodramatic virtue the sentimental declaration of a married man. But both these young persons, if anybody wanted to draw that old-fashioned thing a moral, might be used to show the advantages of the equally old-fashioned style of behaviour for young ladies. In that style you could amuse yourself quite as much as you liked when you liked; and you did not run the risk of unpleasant mistakes being made when you did not like.

GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

SOME EDUCATIONAL BOOKS.

A Student's History of England, from the Earliest Times to 1885. By Samuel Rawson Gardiner. Vol. I.—B.C. 55—A.D. 1509. (Longmans.) It has long been an open secret that Mr. Gardiner, not content to be known only as the specialist of a period, was desirous of coming before the general public with a new Student's History of England. As a professor for many years at King's College, and as an enthusiastic lecturer to the present day in connexion with university extension, he has enjoyed unrivalled opportunities for ascertaining the needs of students, and adapting his exposition to the public taste. Concerning his competence for the task, no question will be raised by readers of the ACADEMY, who have had the benefit of his counsels as director of the historical department for twenty years. This is not the first time that Mr. Gardiner has condescended to write for a popular audience. Not to mention his two contributions to the "Epoch" series, both of which were limited to the first half of the seventeenth century, he published in 1883—when the demands of elementary schools for historical reading-books first made themselves felt—what many experienced teachers believe to be the best story-book of English history that exists for young children. This was followed by a somewhat more advanced Reader in 1887, dealing with social as well as political history. Both those works were profusely illustrated in a popular style, and also contained maps, which are conspicuously absent from the present book. Having thus both explored the field and practised his hand, Mr. Gardiner now essays a more ambitious undertaking, which is nothing less than to supersede the Student's Hume as the standard history for schools. The merits of that work, at the time of its original publication, were very great, and none who were brought up upon it will ignore the debt they owe to Dr. William Smith. But it was compiled thirty years ago, when the reputation of Hume (as an historian) was very different from what it is now. The latest occupation of J. S. Brewer, Mr. Gardiner's predecessor in the chair of history at King's College, was to attempt to incorporate in the framework of Hume the results of recent research. None regretted more than Brewer's friends and pupils that he should have devoted himself to such a hopeless task. What was wanted was an altogether new book, written throughout in the modern spirit. The vacant place is not filled by J. R. Green's Short History of the English People; partly because this deservedly famous book is rather a series of pictures than a continuous chronicle, partly because Green deliberately wrote for readers, not for pupils. Dr. J. F. Bright, on the other hand, in his English History for the Use of Public Schools, has attempted too much. His four volumes are overburdened with detail, and fail to be interesting. Mr. Gardiner, therefore, still has the field before him, and we venture to prophesy that he will enter into possession of it. Following, in the main, the lines of the Student's Hume, he has recognised that the first duty of an historian is to tell a story. Philosophical speculation and imaginative word-painting are alike absent from these pages. We have, instead, the course of events narrated with perfect clearness, the characters of great men described so far as they affected events, and social conditions briefly summarised. Every advantage has been taken of mechanical aids to achieve the supreme object of lucidity. Each paragraph has a prominent head-line; all dates are printed in bold type; there is a full table of contents, an unusually copious index, and several genealogical tables. As before mentioned, no maps are given—possibly for good reasons; but the illustrations would of themselves suffice to rank this book in a class by itself. The illustrations to the Student's Hume were largely drawn from the medal-room of the British Museum. Those for the present volume—which must be some tenfold more numerous—have been prepared under the direction of Mr. St. John Hope, secretary to the Society of Antiquaries, whose tastes evidently lie towards architecture and costume. The latter, perhaps, cannot be fully appreciated without the colours of the original miniatures, but for the former we have here something like a manual of the history of English building. We refer not so much to the naves of cathedrals, &c., which do not always succeed in being distinctive, but to such examples of minor architecture as the Saxon church at Bradford-on-Avon (p. 51), the barn at Raunds (p. 197), and the cottage at Meare (1350). In short, the illustrations are worthy to be ranked with those which have added a charm to M. Jusserand's recent contributions to the history of England from its literary side.

Chronological Outlines of English Literature. By Frederick Ryland. (Macmillan.) The author, who has had no little experience in the teaching of English literature, here seeks to supply a want that must be often felt by both teachers and pupils—a chronological outline of the entire field of English literature, which shall be both full and accurate in its details, and also easy of reference. In other words, he has aimed at supplying what a date-book does for political history, or what an atlas does for geography. Avoiding—as we think, judiciously—the method of charts, adopted by Prof. Henry Morley, he has arranged his matter in a continuous series of tables, so that the eye need never be carried beyond the two pages that face each other. The work is divided into two parts: first, a chronological catalogue of all the important works in English literature; second, an alphabetical list of authors, with dates of their principal productions. The latter is only of subordinate importance, being chiefly useful as collecting from a different point of view the facts already given in the former. The chronological catalogue, which covers about 240 pages, forms the main substance of the book. The system adopted is necessarily not quite the same for the very early and for the later periods. In both cases alike, we have in a first column the English works, in chronological order, from Cædmon and Beowulf downwards. To the end of the fifteenth century we have three more columns of contemporary events, containing (2) works of Englishmen written in Latin or French; (3) foreign works; and (4) important historical occurrences. From the beginning of the fourteenth century, the number of parallel columns is increased to five; and these contain (2) biographical dates; (3) foreign literature, under which American books have been unwillingly included; (4) important historical occurrences, those not belonging to English history being printed in italics; and (5) annotations on the works in the first column. As an example of Mr. Ryland's method, let us take the year 1837, which happens to mark an epoch in literature almost as much as in political history. Omitting some minor works, this year saw the appearance of Hallam's Literature of Europe, of Whewell's History of the Inductive Sciences, of Carlyle's French Revolution, of Lockhart's Life of Sir Walter Scott, of Dickens's Oliver Twist, of Thackeray's Yellowplush Papers, of Disraeli's Venetia, of Bulwer's Ernest Maltravers, of The Ingoldsby Legends, and of Browning's Strafford. In that year Poushkin and Leopardi died, and Swinburne was born; Prescott published his Ferdinand and Isabella. It is only an accident that all this wealth of English literature is accompanied by nothing foreign; for two years earlier (1835) we find Strauss's Das Leben Jesu, De Tocqueville's La Démocratie en Amérique, and Grimm's Deutsche Mythologie. Such is the sort of information which Mr. Ryland's method permits us to gather, for any year and for any period. It is evident that the utility of such a book depends upon its fulness and upon its accuracy. As regards the former, the author has wisely inclined to the side of catholicity, often including works which possess only the historic interest of making us wonder why they were ever thought so much of. As for accuracy, we must be content to repeat Mr. Ryland's own assurance that he has never relied upon Allibone and Lowndes, but has tested their statements by all available means. The extraordinary discrepancies he has thus been led to discover have made him sceptical about all bibliographical truth, and he will be glad to receive corrections. The labour he has devoted to the task deserves a cordial recognition. We know of no book better adapted as an antidote to the prevalent vices of hasty reading, hasty writing, and hasty teaching.

"MACMILLAN'S GEOGRAPHICAL SERIES."—An Elementary Geography of India, Burma, and Ceylon. By Henry F. Blandford. (Macmillan.) This is another of the small books by great men, of which we owe so many to the same publishers. Within the compass of less than 200 pages, Mr. Blandford has managed to give a description of the physical features, natural products, and population, of India and its bordering states, of Burma now politically united with it, and of the adjacent island of Ceylon, which presumed necessities of administration still keep apart. In fact, he has covered the same area as his brother, Mr. W. T. Blandford, has done in his elaborate Fauna of British India. The first portion of the book, treating of India in general, is a model of clear exposition, and is made as interesting as the character of the subject permits. But we confess that we doubt the propriety of dealing so minutely with each one of the provinces into which India is administratively divided. In the result, not only is the reader burdened with unimportant details, but these details to a large extent lose their relative geographical value, as, e.g., when the plain of the Ganges has to be described twice over—under the North-Western Provinces and again under Bengal. The illustrations are so excellent that we could wish there were more of them. We have noticed a few misprints: on p. 84 "Nugna" for "Megna"; and on p. 85 "Mahanuddy" should surely be "Mahananda." On p. 188 there is a blunder of another kind, where it is stated that the Afghans proper form only 2½ per cent. of the population of Afghanistan. According to the Encyclopædia Britannica, from which the total estimate of 4,109,000 seems to be taken, the Afghans and Pathans (including independent Yusufzais) number 2,359,000, which Sir W. W. Hunter, in his Imperial Gazetteer, has turned into "about 2½ millions."

Primer of French Literature. By F. M. Warren. (Boston: Heath.) It is not easy to speak too well of the industry and learning shown by Dr. Warren, who is "associate" (apparently assistant) professor in modern languages at Johns Hopkins University, in compiling this Primer. The number of names inserted is far larger than in any other book of the kind known to us. Their dates are carefully, though sometimes too positively, added; and such statements about them as are given seldom (it is almost impossible that they should not sometimes) fail in accuracy. The fault of the book seems to us to be that it is not what it calls itself—a primer, and that we do not too clearly know what else it is. It might usefully serve as a collection of "heads" to a teacher who did not know his subject; but then teachers ought to know their subject. Its names are too numerous and too bewildering to do anything but bemuse a learner, to whom the brief criticisms appended will be nearly meaningless. Moreover, by the insertion of this multitude of names and of abbreviated criticisms of individuals, no room has been left for what the learner really does want—a sufficient indication of the general character and connexion of the successive schools of literature, which he can then proceed to fill in by degrees. To fail by aiming at too much is not the most inglorious kind of failure; but we fear that Dr. Warren has somewhat succumbed to it.

Spanish Dialogues: an Aid to Practical Conversation. By C. Marquard-Sauer, and Sutton F. Corkran. (David Nutt.) These Dialogues differ from the usual Manuals mainly in the fact that the translation of the Spanish is given for the first forty pages only, about one-fourth of the book. The remainder has merely occasional notes, and a vocabulary at the head of each chapter. The work thus presupposes a certain knowledge of Spanish grammar, and of practice in reading the language. The conversations are far more lively and sensible than is common in books of this kind; they are by no means dull reading, though they do not attain to the raciness of those published by Capt. John Stevens in the beginning of the last century. Towards the end the authors have lapsed too much into vulgarity. Few travellers in Spain need to know how a maid-servant talks about her mistress at a registry office, or of the misfortunes of a gambler driven to pawn his great-coat. Otherwise—saving misprints, which are somewhat too numerous—a tourist who knows a little Spanish might do far worse than run through these Dialogues before setting out on his journey to Spain.

THE popularity of Dr. Vlachos's Practical and Easy Method of Learning the Modern Greek Language (Franz Thimm) is proved by its having reached a third edition (improved and corrected). It consists of a grammar, with sensible progressive exercises on familiar subjects, and of dialogues and reading lessons. There are also excellent lists of familiar phrases, some of which are the hinges, and others the materials, of ordinary conversation, and a knowledge of which does more than anything else to facilitate the use of a foreign language. A Key to the exercises is published separately for the use of those students who wish to dispense with the aid of a teacher.

NOTES AND NEWS.

THE editor to whom Cardinal Newman entrusted for publication his letters written while in the Church of England is Miss Anne Mozley, the sister of his brother-in-law.

MR. ANDREW LANG'S Life, Letters, and Diaries of Sir Stafford Northcote, First Earl of Iddesleigh, will be published by Messrs. Blackwood in the course of the present month. It will be in two volumes, illustrated with three portraits and a view of Pynes. Some interesting information is given about Lord Iddesleigh's Oxford days, and about his personal relations both with Mr. Gladstone and with Lord Beaconsfield.

MR. ROBERT W. GRIFFITH, secretary to the Bishop of Llandaff, is engaged upon a history of Llandaff cathedral, and will be glad to receive any information throwing light upon its condition from 1120 to 1543. The documents belonging to the cathedral, which are under Mr. Griffith's own care as clerk to the chapter, are unfortunately very scanty, though what can be gleaned from the Liber Landavensis and the St. Chad's Gospels is extremely interesting.

MR. NIMMO will issue this month, in an edition limited to 500 copies, The Venetian Printing Press; an historical study based upon documents for the most part hitherto unpublished, by Mr. Horatio F. Brown, illustrated with twenty-two facsimiles of early printing. The author has given special attention to the legislation of the republic regarding printing, and to the guild of printers and booksellers.

THE Religious Tract Society will publish immediately The English Reformation, with chapters on monastic England and the Wycliffe movement. A special feature of the work is three maps—one showing the chief monastic establishments and the order to which each belonged, another marking the area over which Lollardism extended, and a third giving the dioceses in the reign of Mary and the places where the martyrs were burnt in the Marian persecution.

MESSRS. CHATTO and WINDUS will be the English publishers of a new edition of Nathaniel Hawthorne's Our Old Home, in two volumes, illustrated with thirty-one photograph-plates—chiefly views of scenery or architecture, but also including several portraits—all reproduced from photographs specially selected for the purpose.

MR. W. M. ROSSETTI has just finished his edition of Shelley's Adonais for the Clarendon Press. It contains short lives of Shelley and Keats, extracts from Bion and Moschus, the text, notes, index, and preface, forming a volume of over 150 pages. By the way, Mr. Jón Stefánsson claims that Shelley "is fond of using old Scandinavian Scaldic Kenningar (as we call them), or circumscriptives which are characteristic of the Viking [? all] poetry; for instance, 'scorner of the ground' about the Skylark."

HERR J. A. STARGARDT, the well-known antiquarian publisher of Berlin, announces an important work on book-plates—Die Deutschen Bücherzeichen—by F. Warnecke, which claims to be the first on the subject in Germany. It will consist of 255 pages of letterpress, of the size known as lexicon-octavo, illustrated with twenty-six photolithograph plates and numerous woodcuts and facsimiles.

MR. FYFFE'S History of Modern Europe, which was recently completed in library form, is about to be issued in monthly parts. For this serial issue illustrations are being prepared by the following artists: E. Blair Leighton, H. M. Paget, W. H. Overend, H. G. Glindoni, and Walter Paget.

UNDER the title Our Dead, Where are they, a new volume, contributed to by various writers, and edited by Mr. T. H. Stockwell, is announced by Mr. Elliot Stock for immediate publication.

Rufin's Legacy is the title of a story dealing with a Russian non-political secret society, which will be published immediately by Messrs. Hutchinson & Co.

MESSRS. BIGGS & Co. will publish immediately: May Hamilton, a tale for girls, by M. B.; My Schoolfellows, by Ascott R. Hope; Bonnie Boys' Soap Bubble, by Maggie Symington; and a Handy Book of the Household, a series of hints for household work and decoration.

MESSRS. SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT, & Co. will shortly publish two educational works by Mr. H. H. Curtis—A Class Book of English History, from 55 B.C. to Victoria, and an Elementary Arithmetic upon a new plan.

THE October number of Education will contain the second instalment of an article on preparation for Public Schools Scholarships, by Mr. Montagu Baldwin; and articles on Field-Classes, by Prof. Logan Lobley, and on "German Gymnasiums compared with English Schools." Sir Henry Trueman Wood is interviewed on the subject by the Society of Arts and education.

A CONGRESS, under the auspices of the International Literary and Artistic Association, is to meet in London from October 4 to 11. The first meeting will be held at the Mansion House, and the Lord Mayor has also invited the delegates to dinner. The object of the congress is to promote international copyright.

THE Elizabethan Literary Society, which meets at Toynbee Hall, opened its seventh session on Wednesday, October 1, with a paper on "The Two Noble Kinsmen," by Mr. Frank Payne. Besides monthly meetings for the discussion of original papers, the Society also meets on every Friday evening to read the plays of Thomas Dekker and John Webster, and on Sunday mornings to study the poems of Milton. The hon. secretary is Mr. James Ernest Baker, 8 Wivenhoe-road, Peckham Rye Common.

ON Tuesday, September 21, an illuminated address was presented to Mr. J. Potter Briscoe by the staff of the Nottingham free public libraries, congratulating him on the completion of his twenty-first year of work as principal librarian.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN have issued this week the first volume of the Riverside edition of Mr. James Russell Lowell's Collected Works, which will fill ten volumes in all—prose and poetry—to be published at monthly intervals. The present volume contains an instalment of the Literary Essays. The heading is not altogether a satisfactory one; for besides two short papers on Emerson and Thoreau, a longer one on Keats, and the terribly severe handling of Mr. W. Carew Hazlitt in the elaborate review of the "Library of Old Authors," it has also to cover the Mooshead Journal, the charming description of "Cambridge [Mass.] Thirty Years Ago," and the Leaves from the Journal in Italy and Elsewhere. Apparently, the only reason for bringing these together is that they were all written at about the same time, and could not be classed under the only alternative heading of Political. But why should Mr. Lovell disdain the convenient and well-approved Miscellaneous? However, the main thing is that both type and paper are of excellent quality, showing what good work American typothetæ—their own name for themselves—can turn out when they abjure stereotype plates; and for frontispiece we are given a most faithful portrait, apparently from a photograph, engraved on steel after a fashion now almost forgotten in England.

VERSE.

THE FAUN'S PUNISHMENT.—Correggio.

(A Drawing in the Louvre.)

WHAT has the tortured old Faun been doing?

What was his impious sin,
That the Maenads have ceased from pursuing Cattle, with leaps and din,

To compass him round,
On woodland ground,
With cords, and faces dire,—
Cords, fastened with strain,
Faces hate-stretched?

Why have they fetched
Snakes from the grass, with swift tongues of fire,
And a reed from the stream-sodden plain?

Beneath the sun's and the oak-leaves' flicker,

They settle near—ah, near!
One blows her reed, as dry as a wicker,
Into the old Faun's ear;
The scream of the wind,
With flood combined

Rolls on his simple sense:
It is anguish heard,
For quietness splits
Within, and fits

Of gale and surge are a fierce offence
To him who knows but the breeze or bird.

One sits with fanciful eyes beside him,
Malice and wonder mix
In her glance at the victim—woe betide him,
When once her snakes transfix
His side; ere they dart,
With backward start
She waits their rigid pause.
And with comely stoop,
One maid, elate
With horror, hate,

And triumph, up from his ankle draws
The skin away in a clinging loop.

Before the women a boy-faun dances,
Grapes and stem at his chin,
Mouth of red the red grape-bunch enhances

Ere it is sucked within
By the juicy lips,
Free as the tips

Of tendrils in their curve;
And his flaccid cheek,
'Mid mirthful heaves
And ripples weaves
A guiltless smile that might almost serve
For the vines themselves in vintage-week.

What meaning is here or what mystery,
What fate and for what crime?

Why so fearful this sylvan history
Of a far summer-time:
There was no ill-will
That day, until

With fun the grey-beard shook
At the Maenads' torn Spread hair, their brave
Tumultuous wave

Dancing; and women will never brook
Mirth at their folly, O doomed old Faun!

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

THE Expositor for October contains the continuation of Mr. Hutton's reminiscences of Cardinal Newman, exegetical articles by the Dean of Peterborough on Genesis, by Prof. Findlay on the Gospel of Paul at Thessalonica, Prof. Michigan on the Resurrection, Prof. Beet on the Future Punishment of Sin (Book of Revelation), and Principal Brown on Matt. x. 8, 1 Pet. ii. 1, 2, Heb. xi. 2.

THE Euskal-erria of September 10 contains a notice of the celebrated Jesuit Manuel de Larramendi, author of the first Basque grammar El imposible vencido and El Diccionario trilingue, taken from a MS. preserved in the Archives of Loyola. From this it appears that P. Larramendi was as distinguished for physical as for intellectual gifts. Tall, of immense strength and energy, with unusual acuteness of sight and hearing, he possessed a voice, described as that of an angel in its power and sweetness, which he retained to his old age. Of calm, unshakable courage in his youth, he feared no two or three of the strongest men; he led a noble life as student, professor, confessor to a queen, and monk. Rarely have such physical gifts been united with such moral and mental power.

CORRESPONDENCE.

AN UNDESCRIBED (?) IMPRESSION OF THE ELZEVR (1636) VIRGIL.

Stanhoe Grange, Norfolk: Sept. 22, 1890.

By the courtesy of Mr. John Bohn, of Brighton, I have had an opportunity of examining what appears to be a hitherto undescribed impression of the famous 1636 Elzevir Virgil.

There are known to have been three impressions, all issued under the same date, 1636. The original edition has both the fragmentary letter to Augustus (placed in front of the Bucolics), beginning "Ego vero frequenter," and the verse dedication (in front of the Aeneid), beginning "Si mihi susceptum," printed in red. The first reprint has both these passages printed in black; it has further Errata on p. 411. The second reprint has both the passages in black, but is without the Errata on p. 411,

The copy under notice has this peculiarity, that the first of the passages above mentioned is in black, and the second in red. It is without the Errata; it appears therefore to be a variation of the third impression.

The paper on which this copy is printed is apparently of three different sorts; that is to say, there are three quite distinctive watermarks discernible in different parts of the volume, a peculiarity I have not found in any other Elzevir I have been able to examine.

The first of these marks is a "spread eagle," with a single head turned left, and surmounted by a crown; on the body of the eagle are the letters A.B. The "spread eagle" double-headed recurs in what I believe to be a fine paper copy of the Leyden Claudian of 1650. This copy, now in my possession, formerly belonged to Louis Philippe; it is bound by Simier, and has the royal cipher (L. P., surmounted by a crown) stamped on the sides. This paper is possibly of German origin. (The Elzevirs certainly imported paper from Germany, e.g., from Frankfurt). The second mark consists of a large, roughly-executed fleur-de-lys, surmounted by a crown; while the third is a small neatly designed fleur-de-lys, enclosed in a shield, at the foot of which are the initials L. R. (Ludovicus Rex?), the whole surmounted by a crown. These last two papers would probably be varieties of what was known as frans-real, a paper of French manufacture.

As a further means of comparison with the other impressions (the descriptions of which, unfortunately, I am obliged to take on trust from Willems), I may mention that the so-called "tête-de-buffle" fleuron, occurs on p. 1 of the Dedication, that of the "sirène noire" on p. 1 of the Vita, and the "tête-de-buffle" again at the commencement of the Bucolica. The first Eclogue has an ornamented initial, the remainder have plain initials of small size. Each of the Georgics has an ornamented initial, and so has each book of the Aeneid, with the exception of books iv., v., and ix., which have large plain initials. There are no culs-de-lampe.

It would be interesting to know whether other copies of the same description as this one are in existence.

PAGET TOYNBEE.

ENGLISH SCHOLARS AND THE "MORTE D'ARTHUR."

London: Sept. 28, 1890.

In justice to Dr. Sommer, and in justification of my own statements about English scholars and Malory, allow me to transcribe the following passage from Dr. Sommer's second volume, which will explain to Prof. Minto that author's position towards Sir Edward Strachey:

"In my preface to the first volume I have said the Globe edition is 'modernised and abridged.' As I have seen from an article on this volume in the Scots Observer that this statement has been misunderstood, I consider it my duty to say that I hold the opinion that Sir E. Strachey's work perfectly fulfils its purpose—in fact, it is of all reprints the best; but my term 'abridged' is justified; it means that here and there words and little passages are omitted which are not fit for boys and girls to read."

Again, referring to Sir Edward Strachey's description of Southey's work as "a very faithful representation of the original," Dr. Sommer remarks:

"I am sorry that I must contradict Sir E. Strachey here. He most likely trusted too much to Southey's authority. I have collated Southey's with the original text of Caxton, and must confess I found no inconsiderable number of errors."

No one would wish to undervalue Sir Edward Strachey's work; but Dr. Sommer is of opinion, and I fully agree with him, that an edition made, as its editor says, "for ordinary readers, especially for boys," with modernised spelling, and a text not wholly accurate, cannot be considered a complete and critical edition. Dr. Johnson and Landor have said that every book should be edited and reprinted exactly as it was written, without omission or alteration. It is this service that Dr. Sommer has done for Malory; and I must repeat that no English scholar has cared to anticipate him. To say this is to praise Dr. Sommer; but it implies no blame of Sir Edward Strachey, whose purpose was not the same as Dr. Sommer's.

LIONEL JOHNSON.

A BLASPHEMY CASE IN POLAND.

British Museum: Sept. 30, 1890.

Mr. R. W. Morfill, in his article entitled "A Blasphemy Case in Poland in the Eighteenth Century" (ACADEMY, September 20), has repeated some historical inaccuracies which require correction. Among other matters, Mr. Morfill says:

"In the reign of John Sobieski we get the terrible case of Christopher [sic] Lyszczyński. . . who having carelessly written down some freethinking notes, was . . . sentenced to have his tongue cut out and to be afterwards decapitated and his body burnt."

I may state that Lyszczyński's Christian name was Casimir and not Christopher, and that he was sentenced to be burnt alive. I will now give two extracts from Count Valerian Krasinski's Sketch of the Religious History of the Slavonic Nations (Edinburgh, 1851, page 225) and from Mr. Morfill's article.

"COUNT KRASINSKI."

This atrocious sentence was executed: The king was horrified at this news, and exclaimed that the Inquisition could not do anything worse."

"MR. MORFILL."

This atrocious sentence . . . was duly carried out: Sobieski was horrified at the occurrence . . . and declared that the Inquisition could do nothing worse."

At the commencement of his article, Mr. Morfill alludes to Krasinski's Historical Sketch of the Rise, Progress, and Decline of the Reformation in Poland, but has entirely omitted to mention the above-named book, which contains an account of Lyszczyński's trial and execution.

Upon reference to Dawna Polska by A. Krzyżanowski (Warsaw, 1857, tom. 2, page 279), and Encyklopedia Powszechna (Warsaw, 1864, tom. 17, page 719), it will be found that Lyszczyński's sentence "was" not "duly carried out." By the intervention of Sobieski, whose power was very limited, Lyszczyński was beheaded without the revolting cruelty of having his tongue cut out.

JOHN T. NAAKÉ.

THE LIFE OF BYRON.

Burgess Hill: October 1, 1890.

However much of a Tory your reviewer of my Life of Byron may be—or have become—it would surely have been but common candour on his part to point out that I make the distinctive note of Byron as poet to be his iconoclasm, his revolutionary spirit. He is, before all, the poet of revolt. His relations with women and men friends are questions that in my opinion must be dealt with fully and candidly by a biographer; but I hope I have made them subordinate to this other consideration. It was my first duty in this little book to write a biography, not a criticism.

SCIENCE.

ASSYRIOLOGY AT BERLIN.

Keilinschriftliche Bibliothek. Vol. II.
Edited by Prof. Eb. Schrader. (Berlin: Reuther.)

Zur Geographie des assyrischen Reichs. By Eb. Schrader. (Sitzungsberichte d. K. proussischen Akademie XVII.)

PROF. SCHRADER must look back with feelings of profound satisfaction to the work he has accomplished in Germany during the last twenty years. When he first began his career as an Assyriologist, the new study to which he had devoted himself was not only ignored by German scholars, but was regarded by the most eminent among them as little better than charlatanism. For awhile he had to fight single-handed against heavy odds. But his enthusiasm and devotion met at last with their due reward. In 1875 he became the occupant of the first chair of Assyriology established in Germany, and from that time forward Assyrian research has in that country attracted to itself an ever-increasing circle of disciples. It was not long before the most illustrious of his pupils was called to a second chair of Assyriology at Leipzig, and there founded what German writers delight to call "the Leipzig school." Germany has become the promised land of Assyrian studies, and England, though the first in the field, has had to fall back into the second rank. The pioneering zeal of the older English Assyriologists, the vast store of cuneiform materials accumulated in the British Museum, and the welcome given by the English public to the labours of a Rawlinson, a Hincks, or a George Smith, have been counterbalanced by the fact that no career is open in this country to the student of the Assyrian monuments.

Prof. Schrader's last literary undertaking has been conceived in the same spirit as those which have preceded it, and is designed to carry home to the minds of all classes of readers the importance of Assyrian research. The Keilinschriftliche Bibliothek, in the publication of which he has been assisted by several of his pupils, is a systematic and chronological collection of texts relating to Assyrian history. The texts are transliterated and translated into German. Whether the transliteration was necessary may, perhaps, be questioned. In Assyrian, transliteration and translation depend upon one another, the translator's version of a passage resulting in great measure from the way in which he reads the cuneiform characters. In a historical inscription there are comparatively few passages the transliteration of which is doubtful, and such passages could easily have been given in footnotes. On the other hand, the Assyriologist is often saved the trouble of looking up the original passage when the transliterated text is set opposite the translation, though it is true that he may hereby be prejudiced in his reading of the original cuneiform.

The two volumes of the Bibliothek which have appeared form a pretty complete collection of our monumental sources of information for the history of Assyria. As such they will be welcomed by both the historian and the theologian. Thus they are based, it will be seen, on a wholly different plan from that of the new series of Records of the Past, which aims at giving translations of the representative literature of the ancient Oriental world. The two works consequently supplement one another, the Bibliothek filling up with all the completeness at present attainable one of the most important departments of the literature embodied in the Records of the Past.

If I had any criticism to make upon the Bibliothek it would be that the notes attached to the translations are not numerous enough and are too exclusively philological. But from this criticism Prof. Schrader's own contributions must be exempted. I wish, however, that he had exercised the privileges of an editor and made additions to the notes of his younger collaborators out of the ripeness of his own knowledge. In the translation of historical texts notes on the history and geography of the inscriptions are particularly needed.

Prof. Schrader's recent monograph on the geography of the Assyrian Empire shows how well equipped he would be for such a work. In this monograph he handles very thoroughly the question whether the Black Sea is referred to in the Assyrian inscriptions, to which he returns a negative answer; what was the precise position of the Minni, or Mannâ, and the kingdom of Ararat; and why it is that Kition, the modern Larnaka, is not mentioned by the Assyrian kings. As regards the position of the Minni, he and I are now but little in disaccord, as I have long since agreed with him in placing them to the north-west rather than to the south-west of the lake of Urumiyeh. It is only in regard to their western frontier that I think we now differ from one another. This depends upon the geographical position assigned to Urardhu or Ararat. I cannot bring myself to believe that Ararat lay so far to the north as Prof. Schrader maintains; the earlier records of the Vannic princes are not found in the plain of the Araxes, and the inscription of Tsolagerd implies that the latter district did not become a part of the Vannic kingdom until its conquest by Menus. But the geography of the Vannic monuments still requires further investigation.

A. H. SAYCE.

The Flowering Plants of Wilts. By T. A. Preston. (Published by the Wiltshire Archaeological and Natural History Society.)

A GOOD deal of work has evidently been put into Mr. Preston's Flora. He has exercised a wise scepticism, not only as to such things as Vella annua, but also as to Delphinium, Aconitum, and many other British plants stated on insufficient authority to have occurred in Wiltshire. The inclusion of the geological features in the map of the botanical districts of the county is likely to be very useful. But he seems hardly to have kept his book on the stocks long enough. It was written, he says, "in fulfilment of a promise made about four years ago"; and, though no doubt the materials have been collecting from an earlier date, a longer period would have produced a more complete work. There are signs of haste about the book. Gnaphalium uliginosum, he says, "will doubtless prove to be generally distributed." Carduus crispus "will doubtless prove to be very generally distributed." Valeriana sambucifolia "will possibly be found to be the more common form throughout Wilts." But why not delay publication until these simple points had been ascertained? The mention of "Arthur Brunett, Esq., of Croydon," may or may not be a misprint; but loose English is a thing which must have its origin in hurry, and the following sentence certainly ought to have been corrected: "A specimen was sent, but was too much damaged to be really certain as to the name" (p. 181). Iberis and Tesdalia are jumbled up under their own names in one genus with Thlaspi. Mr. Preston's labours, too, would have given more help to topographical botany if he had uniformly noticed the distributions of varieties and sub-species. To do so occasionally is of little use. The different forms of Arctium lappa are duly noticed, but Erythraea centaurium is not further divided.

The great botanical treasures of Wilts are—(1) Carex tomentosa, rediscovered, it seems, in 1890; (2) Carduus tuberosus. On the latter plant Mr. Preston speaks with the authority of one who has studied it alive and in its home. He makes out a good case for supposing that it is a true species, and not (as Prof. Buckman argued) a hybrid of C. acaulis and C. acanthoides. In addition to the points which he urges in a special note, the persistence of the plant is surely an argument worth considering. That it should have been found in so many seasons, and constant to the same place or places, shows that it is more than a result of crossing. Another good plant is Cyperus longus. Mr. Preston remarks that it was still at its one county station in 1884, as if he did not expect it to be there much longer; and, if the cows and horses are as fond of it in Wiltshire as they are in Cornwall, they will make short work of it without any help from botanists. We wonder whether this was the κίπερος on which, as Homer tells us, Menelaus used to feed his horses (Od. 4, 603).

The list of the Flora is a long one, the county having well-marked natural divisions—the hill country and the plain, "the chalk and the cheese." The latter is rich and attractive enough, but the real charm of work in Wiltshire is the chalk downs with their virgin turf. This has not the special attraction of the undisturbed turf of Berks or Oxon, where you may find the purple Pasque flower by some old earthwork on the down, or, if the rabbits have spared them, may come on Orchis militaris and O. simia together at the outskirts of a wood. But, if it does not offer the field-botanist such special rarities as these, it does give him some of the best walking he is ever likely to meet with. It is a good day's march, too, of a varied kind to start from Salisbury, where, as at Norwich, the grape-hyacinth haunts the old church buildings; to go out by the water meadows; to pass within sight of Old Sarum, where the berberry keeps up the memory of ancient cultivation; to halt at Stonehenge, where under shadow of the stones one may gather Carex humilis; and to push on across the plain to Marlborough. On our way we may have seen the blue heads of Phyteuma orbiculare, or even have detected Senecio campestris in the grass. On our right hand we leave Savenake Forest, where good work may still be done; and, if we make Marlborough our headquarters, we shall find plenty to occupy us in the neighbourhood. Botany and archaeology may go hand in hand. We can go out by the Devil's Den and wind our way among the Sarsen stones to Avebury, wondering why Erophila vulgaris will grow in one county upon molehills, while in another we never find it off old walls. We can cross the Wansdyke and return along the high ground, looking into damp patches such as that one which the liberality of a Marlborough master is said to have bought for the sake of preserving the buckbean, or trying with a walkingstick to dredge the sheep pools and see whether they contain anything rarer than Potamogeton heterophyllus.

There is a form of Ranunculus auricomus which should be looked for in Wilts, one in which tubes of some length are developed in place of scales at the base of the petals. This form was first pointed out to the present writer by Mr. Grant Allen in plants about Dorking, and he has since seen one or two specimens at Oxford and others in Dorset and Hampshire. These localities bring it very nearly home to Wiltshire. Sedum dasyphyllum, which Mr. Preston will hardly admit for the county, is abundant on old walls at Marston Measey.

PĀLI "ASUROPA" AND "ĀSU-LOPA" OF THE ASOKA INSCRIPTIONS.

43, Wellington-road, Dublin: Sept. 29, 1890.

Asuropa, mentioned by the Rev. Dr. R. Morris in his "Contributions to Pāli Lexicography" (ACADEMY, September 27) as occurring in Puggala-Paññati as a synonym of kodha, "anger," and in the Dhammasaṅgani as a synonym of dosa, "enmity," "hatred," may be compared with āsulopa of the Asoka inscriptions (Dhauḷi, det. ed. i. 10; Jaugada, det. ed., i. 5). The meaning of this word is doubtful. Burnouf took it as asu-lopa, "le retranchement de la vie," "le meurtre;" and Dr. Kern corrects it to āsulosa (āsu-rosa), "a quick temper." M. Senart analyses it as āsu-lopa, "abandon précipité," and hence "readiness to be discouraged." "Anger" would suit the passage nearly as well, but it would be interesting to know if Mr. Senart's translation would agree with the passages referred to by Dr. Morris. The only difficulty in the way of the identification of these two words is the long ā in Piyadasi's āsulopa. Dr. Morris, however, seems inclined to derive his own asuropa from an original **āsu-rūpa*, which would solve the question so far as the long vowel is concerned. It is hardly necessary to point out that these Dhauḷi and Jaugada inscriptions everywhere substitute l for r.

ἱππότις—VIS'PATI.

Indian Institute, Oxford: Sept. 22, 1890.

ἱππότις, as an epithet of heroes—e.g., ἱππότα Νέστωρ, is allied rather to δεισπότις than to eques (equit-), as in the equation δεισ-πότις : ἱπ-πότις :: δάμ-πατι : vis'-πάτι, where ἱππότις (for *ἱκ-πότις, *Fuk-πότις) = vis'pati. It appears that *ἱκ-πότις passed into ἱπ-πότις by analogy, as there was probably a form ἱππότις (eques) existing in the language at the same time. ἱππότις gives the meaning "lord (pati) of men (vis)," or "chief of the clan."

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

MESSRS. SWAN SONNENSCHNEIN will shortly publish An Introduction to Phonetics: English, French, and German, by Miss Laura Soames. In the French part the author has been assisted by M. Paul Passy, editor of Le Maître Phonétique, and in the German part by Prof. Victor, of Marburg, editor of Phonetische Studien. The main object of the book is educational; and a phonetical reading-book will be added.

THE first instalment of vol. ii. of "Acta Germanica" (Berlin: Mayer & Müller) is a pamphlet of 72 pages, with the title Die Räthsel des Exeterbuches und ihr Verfasser, von Georg Herzfeld. The writer attempts to show that the riddles of the Exeter Book are probably by Cynewulf. The scholars who have hitherto maintained this thesis have usually combined it with an acceptance of Leo's conclusion that the first riddle is a charade on the author's name. Dr. Herzfeld, however, does not take this ground, but adopts the interpretation proposed some time ago in the ACADEMY by Mr. H. Bradley, viz., that the so-called "first riddle" is no riddle at all, but a fragment of a dramatic soliloquy; and he is further of opinion that this fragment is not by the same writer as the riddles properly so-called. The supposed express testimony in favour of the Cynewulfian hypothesis being thus set aside, the only arguments by which it can be supported are those drawn from resemblances in style and diction between the riddles and Cynewulf's known works. The poems which Dr. Herzfeld regards as certainly Cynewulf's are the four signed pieces, together with the "Phoenix," "Andreas," and "Guthlac." As to the last-named we have some doubts. The writer does not press his case unduly, and admits that absolute demonstration is impossible; but he certainly proves that the riddles, or some of them, stand in a peculiarly close relation to Cynewulf's writings. Not to mention many words and phrases common in Cynewulf and the riddles, and elsewhere rare, there are several entire lines of the riddles which recur, with only verbal differences, in "Juliana," "Elena," and "Christ." Although the hypothesis of unity of authorship is not the only possible explanation of these facts, it has the advantage of being the simplest and most obvious explanation; and we see no reason why it should not be the true one. In an excursus Dr. Herzfeld proposes several corrections of the text, some of which (as sweart ansæne in 41, 94) seem very plausible.

FINE ART.

THE AMERICAN JOURNAL OF ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE last number of the American Journal of Archaeology (London: Kegan Paul & Co.) is a double number, for the two quarters ending March and June. It consists of 260 pages of letterpress and xv plates.

A notable feature is a series of three articles dealing with questions in the historical development of architecture, which all issue from Princeton College, New Jersey. The first of these, by Prof. A. L. Frothingham, junior, the managing editor of the Journal, aims at proving that the principles of transitional Gothic architecture were introduced into Italy by the French Cistercian monks. Apart from an elaborate bibliography of books consulted, the writer's conclusions are based upon three tours, during which some forty monuments in Central Italy were studied and photographed. The present article, to be followed by others, deals with the monastery of Fossanova, founded in 1135, which has recently been declared a national monument by the Italian government. In opposition to the common opinion, Prof. Frothingham maintains that the Cistercian, and not the Franciscan and Dominican, monasteries were the earliest examples of the Gothic style in Italy; and, as a corollary to this, that it was from France, not from Germany, that the most fruitful breath of Gothic influence came into Italy. The second of these Princeton articles is entitled "Reminiscences of Egypt in Doric Architecture," by Prof. Allan Marquand, one of the editorial contributors of the Journal. He thus summarises his conclusions:

"We have found reminiscences of Egypt in Doric temple-architecture in the temenos, with its sacred trees and springs and altar; we have seen that the temple-base, the peripteral supports, and the gable-roof are not necessarily non-Egyptian forms; we have found that the Greek preserves the Egyptian methods of construction, even to the use of slanting walls and stuccoed columns; that the temple-plan shows reminiscences of the peristyle and hypostyle halls, as well as of the sanctuary; that the diminution, entasis, echinus, and annuli of the Doric shaft may be best explained upon the hypothesis of an Egyptian origin, and that the Ionic and Corinthian capitals become intelligible in the same way; that the Doric entablature, by both the form and the colour of its triglyphal frieze, betrays its relationship to the Egyptian cornice; and that the ordinary details, whether sculptured mouldings or painted ornament, are mere variations of well-known Egyptian forms."

The third of these papers is by Mr. George B. Hussey, who states that the subject was suggested to him, while fellow in archaeology at Princeton College, by Prof. Marquand. It is an attempt to enumerate the Greek temples of which we have evidence, and thus to estimate (1) the importance of the cities, and (2) the relative degree of reverence in which the several deities were held. With regard to the latter point, it is found that Apollo, Artemis, and Athena come first, while Zeus and Hera stand comparatively low; and that, outside of the twelve greater gods, Asklepios receives the most honour.

We may next mention two brief articles by foreign contributors. M. Eugène Müntz, of the Ecole des Beaux-Arts, Paris, sends a second paper describing the lost mosaics of Rome that are known to have been in existence between the fourth and the ninth century. Herr Paul Wolters, of the German Archaeological Institute at Athens, argues that the marble relief found at Marseilles in 1838—which has generally been considered to represent Artemis—is really Zeus of Heliopolis; and he supports this identification by a comparison of it with the very similar relief found at Nîmes in 1752, which bears an inscription dedicating it to Jupiter Heliopolitanus. The woodcuts given certainly seem to establish his point.

Then follow a number of papers contributed by members of the American School of Classical Studies at Athens. Perhaps the most important of these is another collection of statistics by Mr. George B. Hussey, in which he has brought together all that is to be known about Greek sculptured crowns and crown-inscriptions. His principal conclusions are: (1) in regard to the form of the wreath, the pendent crown belongs to the better period of Greek art, while the erect crown first appears about the time of Trajan; (2) with regard to the crown-inscriptions, these consist of one, two, or even three terms, placed regularly in the order of giver, cause of the gift, and receiver. Mr. John C. Rolfe reports upon the excavations carried out in the spring of 1889 at Anthedon, Plataea, and Thisbe, acknowledging his obligations to Mr. R. W. Schultz, of the British School, for his plans of Anthedon. Apart from inscriptions, the most interesting discovery was a large collection of bronze implements at Anthedon, which probably represent the stock of a bronze-smith. These are excellently figured from a photograph of Mr. W. J. Stillman.

Finally, we have the usual valuable collection of reviews and archaeological notes, which alone fills more than half the number. Prefixed to this is a letter from Egypt, by Mr. Farley B. Goddard, the American scholar of the Egypt Exploration Fund. Though it is dated in March last, we believe that his strictures upon the condition of the Gizeh Museum still holds good.

"The Museum possesses much that nobody may see. A department for monuments of Greek or Roman origin was, indeed, instituted at Bulaq, though it is not yet open to the public. But there are large collections of coins and ostraka, of Egyptian papyri and Coptic MSS., and of Kufic objects, which have never been exhibited, and which are quite unavailable to students. No catalogue is in prospect, nor is labelling of any kind; and the excellent Guide for visitors prepared by Prof. Maspero cannot now be used. It is expected that some change in the management of the Museum will soon be made."

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

MR. J. E. HODGSON, professor of painting in the Royal Academy, will preside at the next annual congress of the National Association for the Advancement of Art and its Application to Industry, which will be held at Birmingham, commencing on November 4.

Messrs. SEELEY & Co. will publish this month The Life of Henry Dawson, Landscape Painter, compiled from diaries and other autobiographical materials by his son, Mr. Alfred Dawson, and illustrated with twelve photographs from paintings by the artist, two portraits, and a number of vignette etchings in the text.

THE Fine Art Society, of New Bond-street, will open their first exhibition of the winter season on Monday next, October 6. It consists of a collection of water-colour drawings of flowers, by Mdlle. Marguerite Roosenboom.

A CORRESPONDENT writes:

"There has been opened in Dresden an international exhibition of water-colour paintings, arranged by the Dresdner Kunstgenossenschaft. This branch of painting, although comparatively a new departure in Germany, has been now so energetically pursued that there are signs in this exhibition that German artists may attain in a short time a degree of perfection rivaling the best English work. It is, therefore, to be regretted that English painters have been unwilling to exhibit their works alongside those of their German brothers, and have thus made it impossible to institute a comparison which otherwise might have been advantageous in furthering the art of both countries. Of English names there are only five mentioned in the catalogue. On the other hand, Italy, Austria, Belgium, Holland, even France, have, by contributing largely, made the exhibition highly attractive for visitors and artists. The picture which attracts most attention is from the brush of a lady, Anna von Broecker. It represents, in a finished manner, a young singing girl. Among the Italian, the works of the well-known Simony call for special notice."

WE quote the following from the Times: "A discovery of the greatest interest has just rewarded Mr. St. John Hope and his fellow explorers at Silchester. In one of the houses, the foundations of which have been laid bare, the excavators came across a dry well, which, on being explored, proved quite a little museum of antiquities. Some fifteen feet down the diggers found an urn-shaped pottery vase, about a foot high, quite intact, and protected by lumps of chalk built around it. The vase, which probably contained originally some precious substance, was empty. Above it were deposited a great number of iron implements, most of which were in a wonderful state of preservation. They seem to have been the tools of a carpenter and a coppersmith or silver-smith, with some miscellaneous objects of blacksmith's work thrown in. The principal specimen is a carpenter's plane of quite modern type, three or four axes, retaining their fine cutting edges still serviceable, a number of chisels and gouges of all shapes and sizes, hammers, adzes, saws, files, &c. In the smith's department may be specified a brazier for burning charcoal, quite complete, two or three anvils of different sizes and shapes, a fine pair of tongs adapted for lifting crucibles, a tripod candelabrum lamp, and several other curious objects the precise uses of which have not yet been determined. In addition, there are several large bars of iron, a couple of ploughshares, and a broken sword. Probably more will be found deeper down in the well."

THE last part of Archæologia Aeliana, published by the Society of Antiquaries of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, contains two illustrated papers upon recent excavations of pre-historic burial-places on the moors of Northumberland. In both urns were found of the familiar Romano-British type, which are here figured in excellent photographic plates. The same number contains obituary notices, by the Rev. Dr. Bruce, of the two veteran antiquaries whom we have lost during the past summer—John Clayton, whose name will ever be associated with Chesters and the Roman Wall; and Charles Roach Smith, whose name is similarly connected with Roman remains in London and Kent. They died within a month of one another, and each had considerably passed his eightieth year. Dr. Bruce himself is now almost the sole Roman antiquary left of that generation.

THE STAGE.

"THE STRUGGLE FOR LIFE" AT THE AVENUE THEATRE.

No one among the playwrights of to-day has a finer touch upon the pulse of the public than Mr. Robert Buchanan. With a high literary record of his own to back him, no man of the day, one might suppose, could venture to set his foot further in the face of Philistinism. Our quarrel with him has always been not that he lacks skill, or versatility, or power, or perseverance, but that he is over cautious, and shows a cynical distrust of any aspirations among his audiences for the higher forms of drama—a distrust and a cynicism laudable enough, no doubt, from the point of view of the cashier, but which the critic may venture to deprecate.

Mr. Buchanan's skill has never perhaps been better shown than in his shortening and simplifying of La Lutte Pour la Vie. M. Daudet's piece is one of the finest examples in modern times of the literary drama. In its English form it is little more than a strong acting play. A heartless society villain—a libertine—having won a rich wife and spent her fortune, seeks first to disembarass himself of her by legal methods, fails, is tempted to poison her, lacks courage as the poison cup is at her lips, gains his way by other means, and when on the point of triumph all along the line is shot down by a humble rival. That is a plot which any ordinary dramatist might contrive. In Daudet's hands it is a greater thing than this; it is a great literary and dramatic "rally" round one of the most important issues of the day. Are human affairs mainly governed by scientific laws and formulae, or does something continually break in to alter the issue—some deeper, more complicated human emotion uncontrollable by science, or at least inexplicable to the savant? This is the issue raised by M. Daudet, and it is beyond all others the "burning question" of to-day in ethics as in literature. The scientist-littérateur ranges himself with science pure and simple, while the higher type of artist-littérateur, the man of supreme emotional endowment and supreme faculty for its expression—such an artist in words, for instance, as M. Daudet—is for taking into account not scientific laws alone, but those laws as they are modified by the more complex motives of our human temperaments.

Mr. Buchanan and his coadjutor have left nearly all these issues out. They have converted a work of high art dealing with a great ethical and psychological problem into a good stirring drama, with strong incident and good dialogue. The necessary comic element is transposed from the original, and considerably broadened and fortified in the transposition. Here are all the elements, then, with commonplace acting and management, for an ordinary drawing-room melodrama, a mere gallery piece; but the remarkable playing of Mr. Alexander and Miss Genevieve Ward save the play from this evil fate, and they are well supported by the rest of the company.

Mr. Alexander's performance is a fine example of serious comedy playing at its best. He sees that the villain of the drawing-room has none of the attributes of the villain of conventional drama. The unprincipled man who wins his way in good society neither hisses out his words, frowns, sneers, nor smiles with an ominous, sardonic smile. Mr. Alexander descends to nothing of all this, and yet by his art leaves the audience in no doubt that he is just heartless enough and scoundrel enough to act the part of Paul Astier in M. Daudet's play. Miss Ward, in the betrayed wife, has a part which with rant and exaggeration must move a gallery strongly. It is not by any means a good or grateful part. There are no great situations, but rather a series of situations which may be described as negative, the plot requiring that the incidents in which she takes part should never reach to culmination. That Miss Ward should so hold the stage as she does is the result of restrained and sincere and most admirable playing. Certain over-emotional actresses of to-day would do well to study this lady in her part. Pathos on the stage is produced, they will see, by restraint far more surely than by hysterical forcing of the note. Miss Alma Stanley is effective and interesting in the last act; but in the earlier comedy scenes she is, perhaps, hardly distinctive enough, and hardly shows her hand sufficiently. Miss Graves is pretty and pathetic as the victim of Paul Astier, but a certain monotony in the pathetic tones is almost inevitable where there is necessarily so much monotony in her lines. Mr. Kerr shows originality and remarkable intelligence in the part of a stammering chemist's assistant, who, in the Avenue version, finally kills the hero-villain. Mr. Chevalier is clever and entertaining as Paul Astier's friend, but his performance is, perhaps, rather too near to farce for so serious a play. Mr. Nutcombe Gould and Mr. Capel act well in a large company, every member of which plays effectively and conscientiously.

"The Struggle for Life" was cordially received, and cannot fail to be attractive to intelligent playgoers.

MUSIC.

MUSICAL BOOKS.

My Musical Experiences. By Bettina Walker. (Bentley.) One cannot read these pages without being reminded of Amy Fay's Music Study in Germany, for here again we have a lady telling us the story of her pianistic life. But the resemblance extends little further. Bettina Walker's "experiences" have a character and interest of their own. Two things tend to make this an attractive book. The first is the lady's enthusiasm. The first time she heard a Beethoven symphony she made up her mind to devote her life to music, and for that purpose she resolved to become a good pianist; she met with many difficulties and discouragements, but nothing damped her ardour. The names of the great pianists—Liszt and Henselt—form the other special attractions. Enough, one would think, had been written about the former; for more than half a century not only devoted pupils but illustrious men and women of all kinds have sung his praise. And yet there is still a peculiar fascination in the name of Liszt; he is the Napoleon of music. Henselt, on the other hand, though a pianist of very great fame, has not been written about to the same degree, a fact sufficiently explained by the quiet and retired life which he led. The pages devoted to him in this book come therefore with the charm of novelty, and our authoress seems to have had special opportunities of studying Henselt, both as a man and as an artist.

Bettina passed through childhood without so much as hearing the names of Handel, Bach, or Beethoven; she had had governesses who taught her "in the most slovenly and incorrect manner," and her first serious teacher was Sterndale Bennett. He appears at once to have discovered that he had to do with an enthusiast. From him she learnt "much of Dussek, Clementi, Moscheles, and Hummel;" and though her fingers derived great benefit from this solid stuff, she longed to play the music of the romantic school—of Schumann and Chopin. Bennett yielded, but reluctantly; he was "severely classical," and could not, as his pupil graphically says, "accept many modern composers without whom we should feel ourselves at the present moment in a sense orphaned." The portrait drawn of Sterndale Bennett is a vivid one; he stands foremost among a gradually disappearing type of musicians, and his characteristic features are therefore worth preserving. Of his earnestness as a teacher Bettina Walker says much; and, when she heard of his death, she felt that she had lost kind and valuable assistance in the art of pianoforte playing.

From Bennett to Tausig is a somewhat far cry, but the famous virtuoso was the next teacher after whom our lady went in search. She wanted, she says, "to be loyal to Bennett," but the charm of Tausig's glowing playing "thrilled and dominated her." The sudden death of this artist, however, put an end to all plans for study, and we next hear of Bettina at Rome, under the guidance of Sgambati, another of Liszt's celebrated pupils. She seems to have been on very friendly terms with Signor and Signora Sgambati; and of the many acts of kindness shown to her by the former, one—in her eyes certainly not the least—was a letter of introduction to Liszt, in which he spoke of her Liszt enthusiasm as that "of a neophyte who has just embraced a new faith." We will not spoil the reader's pleasure by attempting any description of the Sgambati chapter with its Liszt episode, neither need we dwell on the following Liszt chapter. Here at the opening the lady, with skilful pen, describes her first Weimar experiences; she had rooms in the house of the grand-daughters of Hummel, and once more found there in art "a taste severely classical." In her room was a lock of Beethoven's hair, and also the old piano used by Hummel. Between this quiet Hummel home and the feverish Liszt-musical world outside the contrast was indeed striking. The two Fraulein von Hummel had little sympathy with the new movement, although they had no reason to dislike Liszt personally. From Weimar Bettina went to Berlin, and made arrangements to study with Deppe, a teacher of some note, whose death has been recently announced. She was, however, suddenly called to England, and so only had one lesson. Had she continued it would have been interesting to compare her Deppe experiences with those of Amy Fay's. After a time Bettina returned to the continent, and through Henselt's niece became acquainted with the pianist-composer himself. Like all her previous teachers, he too seems to have taken a special interest in her. One would of course like to know what sort of a pianist Bettina was, or rather is; if the kindness and attention shown to her by Liszt and Henselt go for anything, she must be one of considerable merit. She first met Herr and Frau von Henselt at Görlitz, where they spent the summer holidays; and she gives us many delightful details of his home life. She describes her first lesson with him, at which he gave her a study "for widening the hand." How this recalls a passage in a letter written to Hiller by Mendelssohn already in 1838! "Henselt," says the writer, "goes on all day stretching his fingers." He played to her on one occasion a Cramer study; and she caught "such a glimpse of possible perfection that I was at once crushed and enchanted—crushed with an overpowering sense of my own utter dilettanteism, and enchanted with what was presented to me as even a distant possibility." Bettina afterwards went to St. Petersburg, where she renewed her acquaintance with Henselt, and studied his "method" under the guidance of Mdle. Heinrichsen, one of his favourite pupils. Again, in this chapter we have plenty of lively and interesting anecdotic matter.

In "Addenda" our authoress refers to the recent death of Henselt. She, in fact, "stood beside his couch, caught his last conscious glances, and heard the last tones of his voice." Her reverence for the "Musician, Artist, Meister" was intense; and the fervour with which she writes about him resembles that with which the pupils of Liszt speak of their master. It is interesting to learn that Henselt has left behind him a work entitled "Les Expériences d'un Pianiste," in which he illustrates "victories won on the battle-field of Art."

One ought, perhaps, to make certain allowances for enthusiasm in this volume, but there is no intention to misrepresent; and surely most readers will prefer words warm from the heart to cold, even if correct, statements. Only an enthusiast could write such a book at all. There is a list of errata at the end of the volume, but there still remain a few mistakes uncorrected. For example, on p. 200 we read of Beethoven's Sonata in E (Op. 101). One cannot tell whether that in A (Op. 101), or that in E (Op. 109), is meant. J. S. SHEDLOCK.

MUSIC NOTES.

THE dates of the Triennial Handel Festival for 1891 have been fixed. The "Messiah" will be given on June 19, "Israel" on June 26, while June 24 will be the "Selection" day.

THE prospectus of the Royal Choral Society, under Mr. Barnby's direction, announces no novelties, but the list of works is both strong and attractive. It includes "Elijah," Berlioz's "Faust," Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon," Gounod's "Redemption" and "Mors et Vita," Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," and Sullivan's "Golden Legend." November 12 is the date of the first concert.

NOW READY AT ALL THE LIBRARIES.

THE LAST of the FENWICKES. By HELEN SHIPTON, Author of "Dagmar," &c. 3 vols.

BONNIE DUNDEE. By Max Beresford. 2 vols.

"The story is full of strong and exciting incidents, and will be read with interest from beginning to end."—Dundee Advertiser.
"Very pleasant and wholesome reading."—Manchester Examiner.

SLIDING SANDS. By Henry Cresswell, Author of "A Modern Greek Heroine," &c. 3 vols.

"Mr. Cresswell's new novel is clever and interesting, and somewhat original in plot and incident. The tale is very cleverly worked out, and contains several rather striking characters."—Scotsman.

ALL FOR NAUGHT. By Wilfred Woollam, M.A. 3 vols.

"Mr. Woollam has considerable power in character drawing, especially of a subdued and delicate kind."—Manchester Examiner.

THE CRITON HUNT MYSTERY.
By Mrs. ROBERT JOCELYN, Author of "The M. F. H.'s Daughter," &c. 3 vols.

"As an example of light, pleasant fiction, with no purpose in it but to provide innocent and exhilarating amusement, 'The Criton Hunt Mystery' may be honestly commended."—Scotsman.

TWO ENGLISH GIRLS. By Mabel Hart. 2 vols.

"Artist life in Italy is an excellent field for novelists, and 'Two English Girls,' living together at Florence, are the subject of a very pleasant and well-written story."—Guardian.

THE KEEPER of the KEYS. By F. W. ROBINSON, Author of "Grandmother's Money," "The Youngest Miss Green," &c. 3 vols.

"'The Keeper of the Keys' does not fall behind its numerous predecessors; there is plenty of humour in the book as well as pathos."—Athenaeum.

B. M. CROKER'S NOVEL.
TWO MASTERS. By the Author of "Proper Pride," "Pretty Miss Neville," &c.
3 vols. (at all Libraries.)

"Mrs. Croker's extremely pleasant, jaunty, touch-and-go style is peculiarly fitted for the present day reader. The girls she introduces into her story are light-hearted, cheerful types of true English country girls, and the men are manly, straightforward, pleasant creatures. She writes crisply, vivaciously, and intelligently, her strength distinctly lying in her powers of portraiture and of caricature. The general impression produced by the book is altogether wholesome and pleasant. The dialogue is fresh and frequently witty and the characters are one and all drawn with spirit. 'Two Masters' is a book which can unhesitatingly be recommended to readers of all ages and either sex, without a fear of disappointment being in store for any of them."

"Those readers, and they are many, who have delighted in Mrs. Croker's pleasant novels will welcome another from her pleasing pen. That she has lost none of her charm and power to interest her latest novel amply proves. There is the same life and freshness in her work, the same skill in portraiture and apt arrangement of incident. The heroine is all a heroine should be: bright, womanly, and brave. There is an ease and grace in Mrs. Croker's writing that places her well above the ordinary romance writer. Her 'Two Masters' is altogether a most enjoyable novel, free from all the faults of our modern fiction, pure in tone, and pleasant in spirit."—L. J.
"Two Masters" is vivacious enough to have a good chance of becoming popular.—Morning Post
"The interest of the reader is sustained all through. The novel is certainly one which will be read."—Pictorial World.

MRS. ALEXANDER FRASER'S NOVEL.
THE NEW DUCHESS. By the Author of "Daughters of Belgravia," "A Leader of Society," "Purple and Fine Linen," &c. 3 vols.
(At all Libraries.)

"That smart and prolific society novelist, Mrs. Alexander Fraser, each one of her stories seems to surpass its predecessor in vigour and excitement. The reader's attention, once gripped, is held tenaciously till the author's last word. All the author's individuality and courage are well to the fore. The new Duchess is in herself a remarkable study of passionate, unhappy womanhood, and the circumstances of her stormy life are detailed with Mrs. Fraser's well-known power and realism. The whole book does not bore the reader for a single page. The 'New Duchess' is very readable, and that alone is tolerably sure to make it widely read."—Court Journal.

The ATHENÆUM says:—

"The result is so good that we must congratulate all concerned in it; and one especial feature can hardly fail to ensure its success as a popular edition—it is profusely illustrated by Mr. Gordon Browne, whose charming designs, executed in facsimile, give it an artistic value superior, in our judgment, to any illustrated edition of Shakespeare with which we are acquainted."

The PALL MALL GAZETTE says:—

"It is essentially a Shakespeare for the general reader. Mr. Frank Marshall has done his work conscientiously, ingeniously, and altogether well."

The SPECTATOR says:

"Enough has been said to recommend an edition which will win public recognition by its unique and serviceable qualities."

The SCOTSMAN says:—

"This Shakespeare ought to take a foremost place among those editions of the poet which general readers keep by them for reading or for reference. The ornamental aspect of the book is striking."

The GLOBE says:—

"The edition is unquestionably one which every thorough student of Shakespeare must needs acquire."

LITERATURE.

Gray and his Friends: Letters and Relics in great part hitherto unpublished. Edited by Duncan C. Tovey. (Cambridge: The University Press.)

GRAY, while he lived, had the art of winning and keeping friends, and he has been fortunate in posthumous friendships. He does not take us by storm; he does not force himself upon us; he does not ask us to renounce any portion of our individuality; he is an easy companion, indulgent towards our humours and frailties, gentle, amiable, cultured. Perhaps we have learnt in the world

"That will, that energy, though rare
Are yet far, far less rare than love."

And from Gray we get, if not love of a high and ardent kind, at least a very constant and tender affection. He does not persecute us with ideas, passions, doctrines, duties; he leaves us alone when we do not want his company; and we feel grateful to a writer who makes no exorbitant claim upon us, who brings a real addition to our possessions and deprives us of nothing—not even of our indolence.

Mr. Tovey has gleaned with a careful hand, and adds a slender sheaf to the remains of Gray. His design in gathering these papers, he tells us, is threefold. First, they are records of the friendship of the four young Etonians—Gray, Walpole, West, and Ashton, known to their school-fellows as the Quadruple Alliance; secondly, he performs "an act of vicarious piety" in bringing together the letters and poems of Richard West, thus fulfilling an intention of Gray himself, and, at a later time, of Gray's editor, Mitford; last, he here collects whatever seemed of general interest among Gray's unpublished relics. From the papers in Mr. John Morris's possession the editor has obtained the journals of the tour in France and Italy, 1739–40, and the notes of travel in Scotland, 1764 and 1765. Three letters of Gray to John Chute are reprinted from Mr. Chaloner Chute's History of the Vyne. Of the remaining contents of Mr. Tovey's volume the greater part is drawn from the collection made by Mitford, and now among the MSS. of the British Museum.

It is right that this modest monument should be erected to the memory of Richard West. Apart from its connexion with Gray, his life has an interest and a pathetic grace of its own. He died at twenty-six; he had given promise of some poetical distinction; he loved letters; he loved love. And in the background of his life, during its latest years, there lay a tragic grief. His father, the Irish Lord Chancellor, died early; it was stated by Mitford that Richard West had good reason to suspect that his mother, the daughter of Bishop Burnet, was faithless to her husband, and had freed herself from his troublesome presence by giving him poison. Between Gray's parents also there was a bitter feud, but in this case it was the father—selfish, extravagant, violent—who was the offender. The young students maintained their decorous lives, poised the epithets in their Latin verses, made their gracefully humorous comments on the incidents of the day; but each had his hidden trouble. On West, whose health was delicate, the suppressed excitement told with injurious effect, and probably it hastened the end. His death was sudden; a letter from Gray, enclosing the Ode on Spring, was despatched to West when he was no longer living. A letter from Ashton expressing hopes for his recovery was also written after his death. "I singled you out for a friend," West had said to Gray in 1737, "and I would have you know me to be yours, if you deem me worthy." He looked back longingly from Oxford to the Eton days, when, as he says, Gray and he "had walked hand in hand like the two children in the wood:

"Through many a flowery path and shelly grot,
Where learning lull'd us in her private maze."

At Christ Church he was exiled from his friend, "in a strange country, inhabited by things that call themselves doctors and masters of arts; a country flowing with syllogisms and ale, where Horace and Virgil are equally unknown." As he paced alone in the grove of Magdalen he thought with a wistful regret of the school friendship which had suffered loss since he and his friend were parted, and he expressed his feeling in graceful verse:

"The thought, which still my breast invades,
Nigh yonder spring, nigh yonder shades.
Still as I pass, the memory brings
Of sweeter shades and springs."

"Lost and inwarp in thought profound,
Absent I tread Etonian ground;
Then startling from the dear mistake,
As disenchanted, wake."

West's remains in verse do not lead us to think that English poetry lost in him a writer of original genius. But he had a fine sensibility to literary influences, and a genius for friendship which attaches us to the memory of his gentle and pathetic life.

Mr. Tovey, whose editorial work is admirably executed, has prefixed to the remains an introductory essay which is as well worth reading as any part of the volume. Having found a text in words of James Brown with reference to Gray's last illness, and his unuttered sense that death was at hand—"He never spoke out"—Matthew Arnold enlarged very considerably the meaning of the text, and enquired why the author of the "Elegy" turned his poetical gifts to so small account, why he never spoke out. "Gray, a born poet," says Matthew Arnold, "fell upon an age of prose." Speculations upon what might have been are, perhaps, not very profitable; but all the evidence seems to me to fall in with Mr. Tovey's view, that Gray's comparative failure was due, not to the age, but to the individual:

"His was not a type of mind which an epoch of change, however momentous, could stimulate into production. He might have written letters or collected anecdotes about it; but there is no evidence whatever that it would have had any power to bring to the surface any latent springs of poetic thought and emotion. . . . 'Born in the same year with Milton, Gray,' we are told, 'would have been another man.' On the contrary, he would have been the same man, but a less finished artist, if he had been born in 1608. . . . It is my conviction, though I have not space to develop it at large, that, 'born in the same year as Burns,' Gray, if he had lived at Cambridge (the Cambridge which we know from Gunning's Reminiscences) would have written even less great poetry, but perhaps more satirical verses and more prose; what is certain is that his real impediments to production were first feeble health, next his boundless and discursive curiosity, and next the extensive scale on which, like a man who has abundant knowledge, and seems to have abundant time before him, he formed his plans, ever delaying, until the consciousness that the time is far spent makes him sad and silent about them. To these causes must be added his remoteness (by the deliberate choice of one to whom books and comfort were necessities of existence) from those inspiring scenes, the beauty of which he was amongst the first to realise."

Endlessly to accumulate intellectual riches is often to turn oneself into the mere door-keeper of a treasure-house. Gray was more than this, but he suffered from the lack of a wholesome asceticism with regard to things of the mind. He had not always intellectual energy enough to reject what did not make for his best self. Yet in lying open to many and various influences he served his age; he became, as Mr. Tovey puts it, a "high exemplar of the critical spirit." He conciliated classical taste with the romantic sentiment then in its first period of revival:

"Though Gray lived so much in the past, he is receptive in the present, cognisant of new tendencies and apt to resign himself to them, and to forego his penetration when these are concerned; he would willingly believe in Macpherson's Ossian; he is perhaps the only Englishman of note whom it affects, as it affected the Continentals; this is because his sensitive genius had a little shudder of presentiment, at this first breath of the reviving spirit of romance."

We feel that if Gray were now to return to earth he would not think that he had lost his way; he would enter with zeal into modern classical scholarship; he would not be disconcerted by Mr. William Morris and the "Saga Library"; he would understand our feeling for nature, our modern melancholy, and possibly he would take an amused or an alarmed interest in our hopes for the future.

EDWARD DOWDEN.

A Sketch of the History of Fife and Kinross.
By Æneas J. G. Mackay. (Blackwood.)

SHERIFF MACKAY has published, at a most opportune period, his excellent manual—for manual to all intents and purposes it is—of the two counties which fall under his judicial supervision. In his dedication he speaks of the Fife which used to include, and in his pages still includes, Kinross as "the little ancient kingdom, no longer, as Drummond of Hawthornden called it, a demi-island, but a united part of a United Kingdom." This has become true within the past few months to an extent that was never dreamed of by Drummond, and was probably not even thought of by Sheriff Mackay himself. The opening of the Forth Bridge, coming in the wake of the erection of an obviously durable Tay Bridge in place of that structure whose collapse involved such a tragic loss of life some years ago, has placed Fife—more especially during the holiday months—at the mercy of the three leading centres of population in Scotland—Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Dundee. It will be impossible for many years longer to keep Fife unspotted from the seaside world. Then that world—and its wife and daughters as well—have been seized with the present passion for golf; and for the gratification of that passion Fifeshire, whose coastline is one long series of links, affords unequalled facilities.

Still, the Fifers have such a vast resisting power in their history, and in the conservatism of their habits, and even perhaps of their prejudices, that they will decline, at first at all events, to be submerged by their invaders. Their history is quite as remarkable for what it lacks as for what is included in it. Fife took practically no part in what must have been two of the leading struggles in Scotland. The Fife poet, who somewhat but longissimo intervallo—after Matthew Arnold, wrote

"But thou didst scorn Rome's captive for to be,
And kept thyself from Roman legions free,"

seems to have told the truth. At all events, there is no record that the Romans "conquered the district between Kinross and Muckross, as its Celtic natives called, in their apt way of naming places, the head and snout of the well-defined promontory of Scotland, south of the Caledonian Forest, between the Tay and the Forth." Then, while, between the death of Margaret in 1093 and that of Alexander III. in 1286, Fife played an active part in the history of Scotland, it was, to all intents and purposes, nowhere in the War of Independence, although Wallace's chaplain, Blair, was a monk of the Benedictine Abbey in Dunfermline, and there also the bones of Bruce found their final resting-place.

From the first, indeed, the Fifers have lived, and not a few of them have died, in the odour—not infrequently the burning odour—of sanctity. Two of its saints, Serf and Andrew, did quite as much for the "conversion" of Scotland in the earliest era of its history as any others whose names have been handed down by legend, although it is impossible to say whether either was an individual or only a Homeric constellation. Then St. Andrews became in the first place the Canterbury of the North, and in the second the Armageddon of the Reformation. There Cardinal Beaton burned George Wishart; there Norman Leslie and his friends "removed" Beaton; there Knox began his remarkable and occasionally wild work. The greatest event in the recent ecclesiastical history of Scotland has been unquestionably "the Disruption." Thomas Chalmers, the leader of the movement which ended in the formation of the Free Church, was born in the little Fifeshire town of Anstruther, was educated at St. Andrews, and before he migrated to Edinburgh had made a reputation as a professor in his own university. Nor should it be quite forgotten even at this time of day that James Sharp, the one Scotch cleric of note who apostatised from Presbyterianism to Episcopacy, and who, by way of reward, was made Archbishop of St. Andrews, and, by way of punishment, was assassinated by a party of fanatical Covenanters, was, at the time of his "perversion," minister of the Fifeshire parish of Crail. So Sheriff Mackay, in the course of his work, which is of necessity to a large extent historical, seems to be perpetually jostling up against ecclesiastical personages or memories. He does not, however, make too much either of the one or of the other; he almost sighs with regret that the reign of Cromwell in Scotland had not continued longer, inasmuch as Cromwell partially relieved the country of the tyranny of presbyters no less than of nobles.

Sheriff Mackay is quite as successful in his treatment of the industries and the social life of Fife as of its history. He deals with them much in the same way, indicating how they have been evolved, so to speak, out of circumstances, and, perhaps, in a measure out of what, for want of a better phrase, may be accounted the racial characteristics of the Fifers themselves. Most of the industries of "the Kingdom," except education, are in a sleepy if not a hopelessly backward position. Thus, it is curious to read that almost exactly two hundred years ago—in 1692—Kirkcaldy, the chief port of the county, had a tonnage of 1213 tons, being surpassed by Leith alone, with 1700 tons, Glasgow dragging in the rear with 1172. One of the most curious events in the history of Fife was the attempt, about the beginning of the seventeenth century, on the part of a section of the inhabitants to colonise the Hebrides, which failed as disastrously as Edward Bruce's effort to conquer Ireland, or the Darien expedition. It is to be feared, however, that Fife will never again play an important part in the industrial or manufacturing history of Scotland, in spite of the Tay and Forth Bridges. Were, however, some of Mr. Gladstone's later teachings to be taken to heart by the inhabitants, it might become a large market-garden. Still, not a few Scotchmen would prefer that it should remain what it is in Sheriff Mackay's delightful pages—a place to go to for education when young, to visit for reinvigoration when middle-aged, to withdraw to for all the pleasures of retirement when old.

WILLIAM WALLACE.

The Gain of Life, and other Essays. By William Chatterton Coupland. (Fisher Unwin.)

THE essay which occupies some two-thirds of this book—and of which the interest, relatively to that of the entire volume, is greater than its mere quantitative proportion—is not, as its title might lead us to expect, an optimist manifesto, but the dispassionate attempt of a careful thinker to weigh the good and evil of life, with a view to ascertain which scale preponderates. We say a dispassionate attempt, but we doubt if Mr. Coupland himself would insist very strenuously on claiming for it a total absence of bias. At all events, though he puts before us with perfect fairness the evidence for both sides of the case, we feel from the first that he himself is at least inclined to regard existence as a doubtful boon, and we are hardly unprepared to find him at last avowing explicitly that, though he will not let himself be "claimed by the pessimists," he yet does not "recognise a positive worth of life." In other words, he is not sure that life is worth living, and here we find a slight inconsistency in his position. For he tells us in a short preface that his essays are intended "indirectly to suggest lines of practical action," which we take to mean that they include by implication a reference to the ethics of conduct; but if life be not worth living at all, it follows that it cannot be worth living well, and therefore that right conduct is not worth the trouble of inculcation. Hence we notice a certain logical incompatibility between a tendency to depreciate the value of life and a concern for practical morals.

In his endeavour to assess the proportion of pain and pleasure in the world, Mr. Coupland very properly refuses to confine his view to humanity alone. His opinion seems to be that the "sub-human animal world" undergoes on the whole less suffering than the human. And in this he is probably right; for, although the pangs of disease unalleviated by science, and of hunger culminating in death, must be far more heavily visited upon the brute world than upon the human, these two varieties of pain practically cover the whole ground of brute suffering; added to which, it must be borne in mind that the inferior animals escape altogether that anxiety with regard to the contingent future which forms so large a part of human pain, and are, moreover, entirely untroubled by prescience of their own dissolution. We say entirely, for we doubt if even a drowning dog, for example, in his effort to keep afloat, would be actuated by any other motive than a mere instinctive recoil from the physical distressfulness of sinking under water. Where death is unconceived of, the desire to elude death cannot exist; and it may here be parenthetically remarked that the famous phrase, "the Struggle for Life," is inaccurate in so far as it is applied to a quest of the means of life on the part of the lower animals, those means being coveted entirely for their own sake without any conscious reference to self-preservation as an end. Indeed, to the minds of brutes life is, of course, no more present as a concept than its negation is; but while their inability to conceive the latter obviously exempts them from one form of suffering—the human dread of extinction—it also deprives them of the one means of escape from desperately miserable conditions which his superior intelligence places within the reach of man.

It seems to us that Mr. Coupland is least happy in his opening chapter, where certain assumptions are postulated, and certain dicta enunciated as axiomatic, with somewhat of over-confidence in the reader's willingness to accept disputable premisses as established data of thought. Thus we read: "If terrestrial life be all of life with which we have any concern, worth of life must mean comparative quantity of pleasure and pain." This will command the ready assent of but few, if any, disinterested thinkers; for a standard which measures the worth of life entirely by its pleasureableness, without reference to the inherent nobility or ignobility of the pleasure, amounts to a tacit denial that such nobility or ignobility exists, and is thus in its ultimate application cynical and antimoral. This mere "pleasure" criterion of life's value involves a distinct degradation of the Benthamic ideal of "the greatest happiness"—happiness being used as a synonym of good. Again, Mr. Coupland says: "All the ills of human life, however manifold their disguises, have two sources—ignorance and greed"; and in the absence of any adequate attempt on his part to demonstrate this proposition, we do not feel quite sure that such ills as are the result of original irregularities of individual power and capacity are in all cases referable even remotely to either of the two causes alleged. There is something to be said for the theory of an imperfect adjustment of inward necessities and outward resources. Presently we read:

"On the physical side, disease is the chief form the monster Evil takes; and disease owes its origin to a lack of understanding of the physiological functions, of the relation of the human organism to its material environment, and to intemperance."

In part, perhaps in the main, it does, but surely not altogether; for is not Nature herself—pure, unvitiated, pristine Nature—susceptible of disease, as evinced in the life of plants for example? And are we not warranted in assuming the existence of a discordant principle in Nature, manifesting itself on a cosmical scale in abnormal disturbances of material equilibrium—departures from that perfectly smooth working of the machinery of the universe which would be analogous to a state of flawless health in an individual organism? An unequal distribution of vital energy, entailing here a plethora there a privation of force, appears on examination no less truly a morbid condition in the universe itself than in any one of its smallest component parts. The only real difference we can perceive is the difference which is introduced by sentience, with its incidents of pleasure and pain—pleasure resulting from the perfect working of the vital mechanism, pain from its functional disorder.

We dwell the more upon what appear weak spots in Mr. Coupland's logical armour, because he is so interesting a writer that we regret the least intrusion of loose thought or vague phraseology upon his vigorous and suggestive pages. We regret, for instance, such a sentence as the following: "Ecstatic raptures and violent depressions must be paid for by prolonged prostration and unbinging of the system." A "violent depression" is itself more apt to be the penalty for some antecedent emotional state—very likely an "ecstatic rapture"—than something which has to be "paid for." This is simply a case of careless expression; but sometimes we come upon real incoherence in the tissue of the thought—which is a more serious matter. For example, there is a remarkable passage on the side of Determinism as opposed to the doctrine of Free Agency, in which Mr. Coupland, apostrophising his reader, introduces logical chaos by speaking of "that billionth part of an ontical free-will that resides somewhere in the dim depths of your soul." Now, free-will is arguable, and predestination is arguable, and perhaps a reasonable compromise between the two is arguable also; but Mr. Coupland's "billionth part of an ontical free-will" is neither arguable nor conceivable. What is its sphere of operation? Surely not the unimportant daily and hourly acts of our lives, for these in their sum-total comprise the greater part of life itself, and must have some wider source than this infinitesimal rivulet of free-will lost in an ocean of fatalism. Is it, then, in our more momentous actions that we succeed in rising superior to such an overwhelming force of inherited tendencies as, contrasted with our residuum of free-will, is as a billion to one? The latter alternative is, if possible, still more incredible; and we are reluctantly driven to the conclusion that Mr. Coupland is not sufficiently on his guard against such occasional laxities of thought as are apt to be fatal to the value of an otherwise powerful dialectic.

His unfortunate "billionth" of free-will is moreover out of harmony with the whole body and spirit of his thinking; for he may be styled even an impassioned Determinist, and nowhere does he become more earnest than when he is enforcing his conviction that "what has retarded the world has been pre-eminently this idea [now happily somewhat fading] that each man holds his fate in his own hands." He says:

"Much of well-meaning current Radicalism is entangled in the illusion indicated. The temptation is doubly strong for those who decry an ideal that is far in advance of the existing world of practical fact to jump to the conclusion that the political power should and ought to be wielded in the service of this ideal. But surely history has been written in vain if these visions are to become guides for practical statesmen. Abstract rules of right are the authors of blood-stained strife and the parents of injustice; and it might even be shown that the humanest of men have not seldom unwittingly been the world's most dangerous foes. Abstract principles and glowing ideals are for the nourishment of the private intellect and heart; they are out of place in the sphere of private and public conduct."

But surely "abstract principles" kept as interesting objects in a sort of museum of transcendental ethics cannot be very solid aliment even for the "private intellect and heart." The philosopher doubtless sees more clearly than other men the difficulties attending the translation of an abstract principle of justice into a legislative enactment. But it can hardly be his most appropriate office to persuade men of the positive undesirableness of even attempting such a translation; and, although it may sometimes happen that "abstract rules of right are the authors of blood-stained strife and the parents of injustice," the fact is too exceptional and abnormal to be stated thus nakedly. Such an unqualified affirmation is virtually a denial of all intelligible continuity, all legitimacy of sequence, in the moral world.

Mr. Coupland is profoundly impressed by the prevalent gloom of human history—the gloom of its dreadful disclosures, the deeper gloom of its more terrible silences. He is unable to derive much comfort from the new optimism of Evolution—the creed that ages of strife and pain are but a necessary incident in the working out of an ultimately beneficent divine intent, and that a perfected humanity will at last emerge from the long welter of blood and tears. In his eyes such a consummation appears slight in proportion to its tremendous cost; and certainly there is the difficulty that in such a scheme a perfected humanity will alone be the gainer. In these matters, as in the question of the worth or worthlessness of life, most of us have arrived at the conclusion that to speculate at all is but to "build labyrinths about perplexity." Nevertheless, speculation ceases not to fascinate when it ceases to enlighten; and no student of the abstruser problems of existence can fail to find in Mr. Coupland a thinker whose subtlety and daring amply atone for his occasional lack of coolness, and whose brilliant studies in the most thankless of sciences never flag in interest or fail in stimulative suggestion from the first page to the last.

Travels in Africa during the Years 1857-1878.

By Dr. Wilhelm Junker. Translated from the German by A. H. Keane. (Chapman & Hall.)

MR. KEANE has done good service in translating this interesting work, in which a considerable portion of Central Africa, especially Makaraka land and the surrounding regions, are described for the first time. Dr. Junker begun his African journeys in 1875, and continued them, with the exception of a visit to Europe in 1878-9, till May 1883, when the revolt in the Sudan brought them to a close.

The present volume treats only of the first period, which ended with his return to Europe, for the benefit of his health, in September 1878. After a visit to the Lybian desert and the Natron valley, Dr. Junker arrived at Cairo; and there, meeting with Theodore von Heuglin and Dr. G. Schweinfurth, the former drew his attention to the still unexplored region of the Khor Bararka south of Suakin, for the exploration of which the Paris Geographical Society had offered a prize. Dr. Junker was easily persuaded to undertake this expedition, as his original intention had been to make Khartum his headquarters, and he would be able to reach that place by way of Kassala, instead of by the ordinary route through Berber. Kassala, one of the most modern towns in the Sudan, was, when Dr. Junker passed through it, a place of some importance—it was then connected with both Suakin and Massowa by telegraph lines. Defended by a loyal Egyptian officer and a brave garrison, it held out against the Mahdi for many months after the fall of Khartum.

"How much lavish work," he exclaims, "how many sacrifices of time and money, how many centuries of military and civilising efforts have been wasted with the loss of the Sudan."

The dry season made the shorter and ordinary route from Kassala to Khartum impracticable; Dr. Junker, therefore, went by the way of the Atbara, the Rahad (which river was dried up), and the Blue Nile. Of this journey from leaving Cairo Dr. Junker gives, as he does of every journey he undertook, a thoroughly comprehensive and entertaining description. Valuable as his discoveries are to geography, we are inclined to think his observations on natural history and on the tribes he fell in with—their histories, habits, and customs—are even of more importance. He mentions that the youths of the Hadendoa tribe are ambitious of the title of defender or protector of the village maiden, and on certain local festivals challenge each other to a duel of a very peculiar kind. They strip to the waist and belabour each other with whips of hippopotamus hide till one, thoroughly exhausted and streaming with blood, gives way. The victor receives the title of which he is not a little proud. Here is a curious story of the leopard:

"The incredible daring of the Nimr, as the Arabs call him, makes this animal the terror of the neighbourhood. As agile on the crags and trees as on the plains, nothing, not even man himself, is safe from his attacks. But, on the other hand, the hostility manifested towards him by all other creatures, from the smallest bird to the largest baboon, is probably unprecedented in the animal kingdom. It is as if all had combined together to warn each other against the ubiquitous marauder. Scarcely is he detected by any little bird, when the whole feathered tribe raises the hue and cry. One of the numerous ravens approaches, satisfies itself of the foe's presence, and with a scream darts down upon him, taking good care, however, to keep beyond the reach of his dangerous claws. Other ravens, attracted by the familiar note, flock round; the whole company pursues the robber through bush and bramble, perching over him on bare branches or rocks, and drawing other scoffers and warners to the spot."

Dr. Junker's original scheme of African travel was the exploration of the Dar-Fôr, a region at that time presenting geographical interests of the first importance. This scheme was the result of his intercourse with the distinguished German explorers—Schweinfurth, Nachtigal, and Rohlf. It was with this view that he directed his steps to Khartum. Difficulties thrown in his way by the Egyptian government obliged him to remain at Khartum about five months. But this time was not wasted; he took the opportunity of a vessel going to procure timber for Gordon's dockyards to make a trip to Sennaar; and, again, in another vessel going for the purpose of victualling the military stations founded by Gordon, he went to Sobat. It was on this voyage that he first saw giraffes. Here is his description of the White Nile:

"The complete absence of human habitations, and the apparently boundless expanse of open water or of a sea of sedge and grass, unbroken by a single hill or knoll, imparts to this section of the White Nile a character of oppressive vastness. There was nothing to vary the uniform prospect, except perhaps here and there a solitary "snake-neck" or a cormorant perched on some tall ambach. This characteristic growth, which in some places forms whole forests, rises to a height of seven or eight feet above the surface of the water."

Dr. Junker gives an interesting but melancholy picture of the Roman Catholic mission to Khartum. Self-denying as these missionaries were, and energetic as were their leaders, the climate overcame them, and the mortality was so terrible that all the Nile stations had to be abandoned. Of ten missionaries at Gondokoro eight perished in a single year; and of thirty who settled near Kaka, on the White Nile, fourteen died within two years.

Having finally abandoned his project of going to the Dar-Fôr, Dr. Junker decided on proceeding to Ladô, on the Upper Bahr el-Jebel, at that time the capital of the Equatorial Province, and from there exploring the country to the west, much of which was unknown. There were financial difficulties in his way which Gordon, who most fortunately arrived just in time, at once removed. "Money," said the general; "you require no money, nor should you send for any"; and he forthwith issued orders to all in authority to supply Dr. Junker with provisions and carriers free of charge. Ladô was reached in seventeen days from Khartum; and there Dr. Junker found Emin, then Government physician, to whom he was furnished with letters of introduction from Gordon. In Emin Dr. Junker recognised a highly cultured person, who spoke nearly all the languages current in the East. His first journey from Ladô was to Makaraka land, the southwesternmost division of the Equatorial Provinces. This indeed was the chief seat of his explorations. When the Khartum traders in ivory first opened up Makaraka land, the supply of ivory was large; but at the time of Dr. Junker's journey, the herds of elephants were much reduced. The enormous destruction of these animals to supply the civilised world with ivory is shown by the calculation that in the twenty years from 1856 to 1876 Africa supplied Europe, on an average, with 1,500,000 lbs. of ivory annually, besides 250,000 lbs. exported to India, and about 150,000 lbs. to America—representing altogether at least 51,000 elephants!

"And what unspeakable miseries of every kind," Dr. Junker exclaims, "are inflicted on millions of wretched natives directly or indirectly through the ivory trade itself! If only the moans and groans and heartfelt agony could be heard that have been caused by a single tusk in its wanderings for thousands of miles before it reaches our workshops!"

And, indeed, he saw more than enough of the sufferings of the negroes caused by the inroads of the Egyptian traders. In his journey to Kaliká land he joined himself to an expedition sent to plunder the independent tribes to the south of the province of Makaraka. This was avowedly the object of the expedition, and we cannot but think it a sad blot on Dr. Junker's career that he should have had anything to do with so barbarous a raid. He makes no attempt to extenuate the villainy of his companions. To add to the horrors of the expedition, small-pox broke out among the Egyptians; from them it spread to the negroes, who were thus the victims of pestilence as well as of robbers. Famine and disease are the chief causes of the depopulation of Central Africa; in Dr. Junker's opinion, the export of slaves is but a small item in comparison. Gordon was powerless in dealing with the abuses that were inseparable from the Egyptian system, and was so painfully conscious of his inability to reform them that he was glad not to be told of what he was unable to remedy. Dr. Junker perceived this, and on principle avoided speaking of these abuses to Gordon unless directly appealed to. Gordon was grateful for this reticence, and said to him—

"I am very glad to see that you do not bring to my notice complaints concerning men and matters of which you have gained an intimate knowledge, and the difficulties of removing which you fully appreciate. Tell me the means of remedying these abuses and I shall be thankful to you."

Dr. Junker saw much of Gordon at Khartum on his return. He was permitted to spend hours with him every day, and had all his meals with him; and this led to a freedom of intercourse, in the course of which he learned Gordon's real worth. No part of the book is more interesting than his account of the hero.

In spite of all the cruelty and oppression of the Egyptian rule, Dr. Junker seems to be of opinion that on the whole it was for the benefit of the negroes. Its chief merit was imposing on them the necessity of keeping peace with neighbouring tribes and of cultivating their fields. However hard the pressure of a foreign yoke may be, Dr. Junker thinks it preferable in the interests of the negro to the sway of his native despots, which entails an unceasing war of extermination with one another.

Books of African travel are not unfrequently heavy, wearisome, and monotonous. We can assure the reader that he will find Dr. Junker's of a very opposite character; it is eminently readable, and abounds with interesting information and observations. It is profusely illustrated, perhaps too much so, for the illustrations vary greatly in quality. Some, such as the view of the Kassala mountains, are excellent. We must find one fault, and that is with the index, which is meagre and incomplete; but Dr. Junker is in no way responsible for this.

Views and Reviews: Essays in Appreciation.
By W. E. Henley. (David Nutt.)

LIKE other craftsmen, the journalist has at times to labour in a somewhat deleterious air; and his work suffers. His utterances are mostly conceived in haste, and born to immediate oblivion. Often he must write after a certain tradition, perhaps one which he has formed himself and accustomed his public to admire. Periodically, whatever his mood, he must write something telling, that strikes, and does its momentary work, and disappears: and he may well be enslaved by the hundred prepossessions and tricks of style that make up the personality of a newspaper. Doubtless this work is necessary, and there are dozens of men who are born for it and for nothing better. But any fine and exceptional talent has every chance of perishing; and it bespeaks no common force and vivacity in a man if, after ten or fifteen years of habitual journalism, his gift remains untarnished.

Mr. Henley has not come out of this ordeal quite unscathed. Indeed, the weak side of his work seems to depend directly upon the mode of its production; but either he, or the friend who has compiled his book, has succeeded in saving a collection of scraps which betoken a rare and fine critical perception. That such a talent should have gone on spilling itself into the sands of ephemeral journalism for fourteen years is a matter, not only for pity, but, to speak frankly, for disgust. Two hundred tiny pages have been saved, and we are thankful; but think of the force that has been wasted, think of the things that might have been done during all those years with such a gift.

The worst complaint that can be made against Mr. Henley is a certain violence of prejudice. The conduct of a partisan newspaper is the worst training in the world for a literary critic. A good critic like Mr. Henley is far too good for such a work, which he has lately undertaken; and it is only surprising that he has suffered so little. But why should noisy prejudice be brought at all into the calm and grave senate-house of literature? The great writers who sit above are only grieved and surprised as they look down and behold these strange heats, this discursive violence. Why, for instance, should we be told about Benjamin Disraeli that he was "the antithesis of Grocerdom, the Satan of that revolt against the yielding habit of Jehovah-Bottles, the spirit whereof is fast coming to be our one defence against socialism and the dominion of the Common Fool"? When a writer gives way in this fashion, style and matter deteriorate together. In France, only a very foolhardy or a very obscure critic would venture to print such a sentence. It is not merely an imitation of Carlyle: it is the kind of imitation that might have been palmed off by a "medium" as a communiqué from Carlyle's departed spirit. Mr. Henley has, as befits his political sympathies, an astoundingly high opinion of Disraeli; and he evidently prefers his flash jewellery to all the nature and all the humour of George Eliot, whom he dismisses with a handful of laboured epigrams about "Pallas with prejudices and a corset" and "the fruit of a caprice of Apollo for the Differential Calculus." One suspects that, with the true Tory, the real objection to George Eliot is her sex; and that, if from some accident that sex had never been revealed, we should have heard less about her feminine pedantry and the rest. The creator of Dorothea and Mrs. Poyser will survive these onslaughts, as well as the excesses of her own admirers; and hers will not be the reputation that will suffer from either. There are some trifles in the book which Mr. Henley's editor had better have left where he found them; for instance, the translation of "faire le bon Dieu" on p. 141 is simply vulgar; and the paragraphs on Boswell have been anticipated by Carlyle—not the Carlyle who raves against "the common fool" and "Grocerdom," but the great poet and true prophet Carlyle.

Enough, and too much, of complaint; the excision of half a dozen pages would render the book charming and stimulating without interruption. It is crammed with good things, and the good things are those of a man who can be both a wit and a poet. The wit is often neat; but of the two the poetry is the rarer. Plenty of men can replace a phrase-maker, unless he be a Voltaire; but a poet once lost or stifled is irrecoverable. One is tempted to say: Take care of the poet, Mr. Henley, and let the wit take care of himself!

"In Herrick the air is fragrant with new-mown hay; there is a morning light upon all things; long shadows streak the grass, and on the eglantine swinging in the hedge the dew lies white and brilliant. Out of the happy distance comes a shrill and silvery sound of whetting scythes; and from the near brook-side rings the laughter of merry maids in circle to make cowslip-balls and babble of their bachelors."

And again,

"In his [Longfellow's] verse the rigging creaks, the white sail fills and crackles, there are blown smells of pine and hemp and tar; you catch the home wind on your cheeks; and old shipmen, their eyeballs white in their bronze faces, with silver rings and gaudy handkerchiefs, come in and tell you moving stories of the immemorial, incommunicable deep."

We want more of this quality from Mr. Henley and less about "Pallas with a corset." What a difference between the speech of the heart and imagination and the speech of the prejudices and passions!

It must also be said that Mr. Henley does not treat his fine gifts altogether respectfully. His views are exasperatingly disjointed and incomplete; his good things are atoms with no mutual cohesion. We are not sure whether we have his total opinion upon anything, or whether he has a total opinion; and we feel that a little more trouble and a little more constructiveness might make his work ten times better. If he could only sit down and write a patient study of some particular writer, after the time-honoured fashion of the French critics, he would do himself far more justice than his friend and compiler has been able to do him. Each saying would be riper; there would be a single impression instead of a bewildering series of diverse impressions; and we should have the whole mind of the man given us by himself, instead of disjointed portions of his mind presented by somebody else. Such a talent as his is worth a little fostering.

It would take too much room even to name the forty writers on whom Mr. Henley has published his notes. Probably the most admirable of all is the criticism on Mr. George Meredith's writing and scope. Mr. Henley has missed Mr. Meredith's essential loftiness and hard-won strength of thought; but all the remarks on his artistic side are excellent—and, further, are the first excellent things ever printed on the subject. "There is genius, but there is not felicity." Certain of his characters "have the unity of effect, the vigorous simplicity of life, that belong to great creative art; and at their highest stress of emotion, the culmination of their passion, they appeal to and affect you with a force and a directness that suggest the highest achievement of Webster."

This remark is made à propos of Rhoda Fleming, the strongest of all Mr. Meredith's works; and it is so little known or popular that Mr. Henley has done a real service in singling it out for such strong and just language. "A merciless impeachment of respectability" exactly describes it.

The judgment on Sidney may serve as a final example of Mr. Henley's cosmopolitan reading and appreciation, as well as of a certain excess of hardness which sometimes visits him.

"Sidney's prime faults," he says, falling for the moment into the brief jotting style of Lamb (who, by the way, has a truer and more admiring view of Sidney), "are affectation and conceit. His verses drip with fine love-honey; but it has been so much clarified in metaphysics that much of its flavour and sweetness have escaped."

"When all is said he remains no more than a brilliant amorist, too super-subtle for complete sincerity, whose fluency and sweetness have not improved with years."

This is hard measure; but Mr. Henley is often to be found administering unjust censure in a finished style. There are dozens of things as good up and down the book; and from the sub-title "Literature" which appears on the title-page we are encouraged to hope for a companion volume upon Art.

OLIVER ELTON.

SCHETTINI AND THE REACTION AGAINST THE MARINISTI.

Pirro Schettini e l'Antimarismo. By Vittorio Caravelli. (Naples.)

PIRRO SCHETTINI, the subject of this memoir, was born near Cosenza in 1630, seven years after the publication of the famous "Adone" of Giovanni Battista Marini. This poem, which has perhaps never been equalled in point either of length (it contains some 45,000 lines) or of bad taste, was hailed on its appearance as a work of supreme genius; and its author received more applause during his lifetime than was ever accorded by their contemporaries to either Dante or Petrarch.

The "Adone," which at once found a host of imitators, became the parent in Italy of the debased literary style known as "Marinismo," after the name of its originator; or more generally as "Secentismo," from the period during which it chiefly prevailed. Involved and inflated language, extravagant conceits, far-fetched metaphors, abundance of pedantic and obscure allusions, and above all a never-failing fertility in surprises, in obedience to the absurd dictum that the aim and end of poetry is to excite the wonderment of the reader—"è del poeta il fin la meraviglia"—such were the chief characteristics of the school which regarded the author of the "Adone" as its founder. "Marinismo" was in fact the Italian counterpart of the Spanish "Cultismo," and of the English "Euphuism"; and Marini may rank with Gongora and Lyly as one of the high-priests of affectation and pedantry. That a reaction against this artificial style should set in sooner or later was inevitable in the nature of things; and it is to Schettini, as Signor Caravelli claims, that is due in no small measure the credit of hastening the reaction and of infusing new life into Italian poetry.

Schettini was intended by his father for the legal profession, and he went so far as to obtain his doctor's degree at the university of Naples,* but he soon abandoned the law for the more congenial pursuit of literature. He naturally enough at first followed the prevailing fashion, and, as his biographer puts it: "si diede a marineggiare nelle canzonettine per musica, nei madrigali e nei sonetti." Of these early poems, which are characterised by all the extravagances of the Secentisti, Signor Caravelli gives several examples, some here printed for the first time.† A single line in which the ships of a fleet are likened to—will suffice as a specimen.

Schettini, however, soon exchanged this artificial verse-making for composition of a more serious nature, the immediate cause of the change being an unhappy passion for a "lady of high degree." The identity of this lady, whom he always addresses as Phyllis, has not yet been established, and it has been inferred in consequence that she was a fictitious personage. There can be little doubt, however, from the nature of Schettini's later poems, that the object of his passion was no mere abstraction; their tone is too real, too natural to have been the outcome of a purely artificial sentiment. The two following sonnets, written under the influence of this passion, show how completely he had separated himself from the Marinisti. The first, composed evidently during a fit of dejection, is addressed to Death:—

"O Morte, o tu de' miseri mortali
Contro a' flutti del Mondo, e contro a' venti
Sicuro porto: o de l' afflitte menti
Dolce ristoro, eterno oblio de' mali:
Quando fia che si scioglia, o che s' allenti
Il nuvol denso de' miei sensi frali?
Vieni, O Morte pietosa, a sciogliermi l' ali;
Cieco vulgo da te fugga e paventi.
Folle, e' non sa ch' il glogio indegno e greve
Spezzi d' amor tu sola, e de la sorte
Fermi la rota e 'l variar si lieve.
Io te vorrei per mio riposo, o Morte:
E chi si duol che nostra vita è breve
Duolsi che l' ore del penar sien corte."

In the second the poet compares himself to a caged bird that has lost the taste for liberty, and when freed returns again to confinement:—

"Angel, che visse in chiusa gabbia oscura
Sua verde età da man leggiadra accolto,
Del caro nido onde primier fu tolto,
Più non gli cal nè libertà più cura.
Anzi s' altrui pietade, o sua ventura
Gli addita il varco, onde fuggir può sciolto,
Vola e rivola, e più rimane involto;
Chè quel lung' uso al fin si fe' natura.
Così, Filli, il mio cor che per tant' anni
Vi fu soggetto, il grave giogo indegno
Non sente più, nè servitù, nè affanni;
E se l' aurea prigion, ove soggiorna,
Apre talor Fortuna, o vostro sdegno,
O non sen fugge, o volentier vi torna."

If the influence of Petrarca is here perceptible, it at any rate shows that Schettini was in advance of his time, and that he had the taste to revert to a good model instead of slavishly following in the steps of his contemporaries. He can hardly, however, be allowed the claim made for him here, of having been largely instrumental in bringing about the reaction against the Secentisti; for, though he commanded a following in the Cosentine Academy, and had at least one devoted disciple in Carlo Buragna, his influence appears to have been for the most part personal only. The Academy of Cosenza, for instance, which had been momentarily galvanised into new life by him, relapsed after his death into its pristine comatose condition. It was left for Filicaja, Guidi, Menzini, and, above all, Crescimbeni, the founder of the "Arcadia," to effectually purify the national taste and to regenerate Italian poetry. Schettini was at most but a forerunner of the movement, without in any real sense being the originator of it.

The interest in Schettini as a writer is a historical rather than a literary one; that is to say, we are less concerned with his poems as literary compositions than with the fact that they mark the commencement of the reactionary period. His reputation has suffered possibly from the fact that only a small proportion of what he wrote has been preserved, the bulk having been committed to the flames by himself. Even his biographer, however, whose object in writing this memoir is to rescue his name from oblivion, does not affect to regard the loss as a serious one for Italian letters.

Signor Caravelli, who deserves credit for the careful and dispassionate way in which he has treated his subject, concludes with a notice of the Sardinian poet, Carlo Buragna, who was the contemporary and faithful disciple of Schettini. Both his poems and those of his master are likely to be neglected, save by the more curious enquirer into the literary history of the period.

NEW NOVELS.

Two Masters. By B. M. Croker. In 3 vols. (White.)

A Marked Man. By Ada Cambridge. In 3 vols. (Heinemann.)

Lover or Friend? By Rosa N. Carey. In 3 vols. (Bentley.)

The Hand of Vengeance. By George F. Underhill. (Trischler.)

A Poppy's Tears. By Mannington Caffyn. (Chapman & Hall.)

Edelweiss. By "Rita." (Spencer Blackett.)

Mount Eden. By Florence Marryat. (Hutchinson.)

THE motto from "Othello" which Miss Croker adopts for her Two Masters, "I do perceive here a divided duty," refers to the difficulties which beset her heroine. Ellen Le Marchant, or Deane, marries Captain Karslake, in response to his urgent entreaties, although he knows that her father was convicted of murder nearly twenty years before. Nevertheless Philip Deane was completely innocent of the crime, the real criminal being a fellow officer named Kant, who had lost heavily to his victim at cards, and owed him large sums of money. But circumstantial evidence all pointed to Deane, and he was sentenced to penal servitude for life. At the time the novel opens he is presumed to be dead; but his daughter, on visiting Ireland, discovers him near the scene of the tragedy in the person of a supposed lunatic, who goes by the sobriquet of "Mad Dominick." Ellen Deane learns the whole circumstances of the murder, and sets herself to the task of clearing her father and bringing the crime home to the real man. An overcoat and a sleeve-link play a conspicuous part in fixing the guilt upon Colonel Kant; and when he can no longer fight against the accumulated evidence, he makes full confession and dies at the eleventh hour. Ellen did not succeed in her efforts until she had momentarily compromised herself, and her "divided duty" lay between her husband and her father, the latter forcing her to secret action. She becomes Lady Karslake in the end, and her romantic adventures furnish society with the usual nine days' gossip. Miss Croker writes pleasantly, without manifesting any special gifts, and her novel is fairly readable. The Irish brogue of some of the characters is pretty well sustained, but an old Irish woman in the lowliest station is scarcely likely to give utterance to such phrases as "I could expatiate to you for hours."

A story of two generations is unfolded in A Marked Man. The first volume deals with the early life of Richard Delavel, a younger scion of an ancient house, settled at Dunstanborough Hall, on the east coast. Delavel, captivated by the beauty of a daughter of one of the villagers, commits the "disgrace" of marrying her. As he has already deeply angered his father by refusing to take orders, for which he has no vocation, he is now cut off from all communication with his family. To make matters worse, he finds that his wife is self-indulgent and absolutely devoid of any of the finer feelings and aspirations. But Dick's character is sterling gold. He is true to his wife, though he has met with another woman who could answer to his soul's utmost needs, and who nursed him through an apparently fatal illness. He makes his fortune in Australia, and finds some consolation in the affections of his only child, a daughter, with the same deep but unconventional nature as his own. Miss Cambridge's second and third volumes detail the latter portion of Richard Delavel's career, with its pathetic ending, and the union of his daughter with Rutledge, a colonist and ex-clergyman. In spite of its somewhat disjointed character, the story may generally be commended for its fresh views of life.

* It is characteristic of the times that this degree was obtained by fraud, the necessary declaration of three witnesses as to Schettini's attendance at the required number of lectures having been falsely sworn to. Such perjured declarations appear to have been by no means unusual at that period, at any rate in the university of Naples.

† Schettini's poems were first published by Bulifon at Naples in 1693—misprinted 1593 by Sig. Caravelli; they were reprinted, according to Gamba, in 1710, and again in 1779, both times at Naples. No complete edition of his extant works exists. Such as have been preserved are contained in an autograph MS. in the Bib. Naz. at Naples.

Miss Carey's Lover or Friend? is written with all that delicate charm of style which invariably makes this writer's works pleasant reading. There is no profound thought in them, and none of that originality which lights up the pages of genius; but no one could say that they are ever dull, or altogether commonplace. There is an imitative touch of Jane Austen in the delineation of the Ross and Blake families in the first volume of the story before us, while the second and third volumes are not without their element of tragedy—that is, anguish and suffering are brought before us in a very direct and real manner. Audrey Ross, the heroine, is a most attractive girl—all the more winning, perhaps, from her waywardness and an unconventional habit of looking at things. She is drawn into an engagement with Cyril Blake, and she really has some love for him; but in the background is Captain Burnett, the lover and friend, who has watched over her since girlhood, and who stands closer to her heart than she has any conception of until she is in danger of losing him, and then the friend becomes lover and husband too. But before this happy conclusion is reached Cyril has bravely given up Audrey, on discovering that there is a terrible stain upon his family, and that he is not even entitled to the name he bears. Then he crowns a noble, if brief, life by a supreme act of heroism. To save his worthless father from death on the railway, he unhesitatingly sacrifices his own life. Cyril Blake and Michael Burnett (who is himself a Victoria Cross man) are worthy of each other in their lofty unselfishness and grandeur of character.

The Hand of Vengeance is one that is wielded by a Devonshire girl named Norah Godfrey, and very heavily does she manage to bring it down upon Jack Belgrave in the end. Belgrave has ruined her sister, and caused the suicide of her father. He quits the little Devonshire village, apparently leaving no trace; but Norah registers a vow that she will find him, and ruthlessly pursues him unto the death. She is aided by a lover to whom she promises marriage. Belgrave is discovered in London; he is harassed in a variety of ways, falls into hopeless difficulties, and is at last killed while riding a vicious mare which Norah's lover has sold to him. Mr. Underhill leaves the question whether Norah was justified in her action to be settled by the moralist. One can understand the quick and sudden revenge of a young country girl, but not the slow deliberate cruelty which is here depicted.

Mr. Mannington Caffyn gives us a painful picture of the deterioration, ruin, and death of a morphia victim in A Poppy's Tears. It will all the more serve as a warning from the fact that Paul Stewart's first acquaintance with the insidious drug was in a degree accidental. A few drops are injected into his system to relieve him from pain and induce sleep, after he has performed a noble action in saving several lives from a horrible death by fire. By degrees, however, the drug becomes a necessity to him. He fights against the slavery which threatens him, but in vain. Friends are powerless to save him, including even the woman who is dearer to him than anything else in the world. Sad and horrible is the end of all. Mr. Caffyn writes vigorously; but now and again he treats lofty subjects with a candour approaching flippancy. Yet his sketch is certainly clever.

Edelweiss is a delightful little tale, with a halo of real poetry round it. A child found on the mountains is brought up by an honest Swiss peasant as his daughter, and he gives to her the name of Edelweiss. She is as beautiful in nature as she is in person; and after an existence all too brief, glorified by love and devotion, she lays down her life simply and unreservedly for her lover. The story is extremely tender and touching.

A new edition has been called for of Florence Marryat's Mount Eden. It is an attractive story, there being sufficient novelty in the adventures and changes of fortune on the part of the heroine, Evelyn Rayne, to keep the reader's interest alive all through. The villain, her cousin, William Caryll, is a despicable creature; and it affords peculiar satisfaction when he at last richly meets with his deserts, and his machinations for obtaining possession of the estate of Mount Eden are ruthlessly overthrown.

G. BARNETT SMITH.

RECENT THEOLOGY.

Economic Morals. Four Lectures. By the Rev. Wilfrid Richmond. (W. H. Allen.) These lectures were delivered during Lent, 1889, at Sion College to an audience composed chiefly of clergy. They sum up as simply and clearly as possible the views already expounded by their author at greater length and in less popular style in his Christian Economics. Mr. Richmond has performed his task very well. From the crowd of preachers and teachers who vaguely declaim against an immoral political economy they have not taken the trouble to study or understand, Mr. Richmond is honourably distinguished by his grasp of the subject and his original intellectual power. Christian Economics was not an easy book, because it covered a very wide ground without stopping to enlarge upon separate points. These four lectures will serve as an excellent introduction to it. They form the most striking presentment of what is meant by a moral political economy which has appeared since Mr. Ruskin's Unto this Last; and they are calculated to arrest the attention of the large class of readers who were repelled rather than attracted by the splendid but paradoxical eloquence of that most eloquent treatise. Mr. Richmond is eminently temperate both in language and logic. He leaves no prejudices or difficulties which his reader may entertain unconsidered or unexplained. He wishes them to yield to the eloquence not of indignation, but of common sense. He can hit very hard when he wants to. His account of the inefficiency of almsgiving, so often "magnificent rather than moral," and his picture of that "very charming character," "the economic man," may be given as instances; but he never forgets that to lash opponents is rarely the best way to convince them. The lectures are followed by a very carefully prepared analysis. After an introduction on the different senses of the word "law," and a consideration of the question whether or how far economic laws are divine laws, it is urged that Christians as such must accept the principles of Socialism, and cannot refuse assent to its theories as to (1) rent and interest, and (2) the possible efficacy of law, until they have carefully studied and applied these principles. Lecture II. is on the law of justice and the meaning of exchange; Lecture III. on the law of help; Lecture IV. on the "Economic Ideal." Mr. Richmond holds that "the desire for life and enjoyment is in itself a form of duty"; and that it is this wholesome and right desire which is the necessary and useful element in those competitive instincts which Mr. Ruskin entirely curses and economists till recently have entirely blessed. This very brief indication of Mr. Richmond's point of view must suffice. He has lucidly stated in this short volume the most important principles of his thoughtful and original scheme of Christian economics.

For Christ and City. Liverpool Sermons and Addresses. By the Rev. C. W. Stubbs. (Macmillan.) This is a somewhat heterogeneous collection of addresses. It contains a selection of sermons preached by a town clergyman on occasions demanding special care or effort. Mr. Stubbs has been known hitherto as a writer on country problems; in Village Politics and The Land and the Labourers he dealt chiefly with the labour question and co-operative agriculture, giving an account of valuable practical experiments in a style genial, eloquent, and earnest. His sphere of work is now an important suburb of Liverpool, and the volume before us shows that Mr. Stubbs in town is as fresh and original in his plans and methods of work as he was in the country. The last paper on "Work and Worship in a Suburban Parish" is his report of his first year's work in the form of a pastoral letter. It is published as containing "the statement of certain principles of Church work," and proves that the writer has not allowed his study of country questions to keep him from a consideration of town problems. It displays remarkably Mr. Stubbs's power of writing freshly and brightly on the dullest topics. Three of the addresses are on the work, position, and reform of the English Church, and present us with a broad Churchman's ideal of a Christian Church. The most important of these addresses, on "Church Comprehension and Reform," has already appeared in part in the volume on Church Reform in the "Imperial Parliament Series." The general reader will most appreciate the sermons on F. D. Maurice and Sir James Picton, and the sketch of Bryan Blundell, one of the makers of Liverpool, occurring in the sermon which gives its title to the collection. We are acquainted with no short account of F. D. Maurice at all equal to Mr. Stubbs's in clearness and comprehensiveness. This volume is the fruit of one year's work in a large town, and if the writer's health and strength permit, will doubtless be followed by others. These may, perhaps, exhibit more connexion and cohesion in their construction, a greater concentration of energy, and more definiteness of aim; but they cannot be more stimulating, more earnest, more full of useful suggestions and original ideas.

The True Life and Other Sermons. By the Rev. Robert Eyton. (Kegan Paul & Co.) Prebendary Eyton's sermons are of a kind becoming happily not so uncommon as it has been in the past. They are the work of a man of wide culture and conscientious thoughtfulness. He has realised that theological learning alone, if it is not brought into vital relation with the ordinary thoughts and work of men, can never gain the ear of the ordinary worshipper; and he is aware that it is the duty of a preacher in explaining a passage of Scripture to know and to examine the difficulties it suggests, not to himself but rather to the thoughtful or perplexed in his congregation. Prebendary Eyton's culture, the width and wisdom of his reading, are not so rare now-a-days as his conscientiousness, his carefulness of statement, his anxious honesty. The two qualities coming together make his style eminently persuasive; he is eloquent and impressive, and at the same time trustworthy; his evident care not to deceive himself convinces us that he will not play any rhetorical tricks with his listeners. The preface apologises very unnecessarily for possible obligations to the writings of others which may not have been acknowledged by a reference. Prebendary Eyton has made the thoughts of his sermons thoroughly his own, and states them in his own style and language. It is difficult to criticise specially the thirty-six sermons contained in the volume, because the preacher rarely falls below his own level; but Sermons XI., XIV., XIX., and XXXI., may be mentioned as specially interesting.

The Country Clergyman and his Work. By the Rev. Herbert James. (Macmillan.) Mr. James's survey of the work of a country clergyman takes the form of six lectures, delivered originally in the Divinity School, Cambridge, in May, 1889. Although he declines to limit his field of view by his own forty years of ministry, and finds in them "personal humbling" rather than "practical helping," it is, nevertheless, the thorough personal acquaintance of the lecturer with his subject which makes his book valuable. His lectures are well-arranged, and excellently adapted to arrest and hold the attention of the reader. He is an experienced and painstaking speaker; but his vivacity and his pains are almost unnecessary. He so obviously speaks from a full and varied experience that we are indifferent to graces of style or clearness of arrangement. The fifth lecture, on "parochial organisation," is specially full of practical detail. The first, on the country clergyman's "field," sketches in broad outlines the writer's opinion of the present condition and recent progress of the countryman. That opinion is, on the whole, encouraging. "There is a general levelling-up in the matters of position, of taste, of feeling. . . . The English labourer is a better paid, better housed, better dressed, better mannered man than he was thirty years ago." The divinity students for whose benefit these lectures were delivered could not have found a more genial or capable teacher; and the country clergyman who comes across them in print will read them with sympathy, admiration, and profit.

The Old Documents and the New Bible. By J. Paterson Smyth. (Bagster.) Mr. Smyth is the author of the popular How we Got our Bible, now in its sixth edition. He is, therefore, succeeding in his effort to convey to the general reader an intelligent and informed conception of the history of the formation of the Biblical Canon. His second effort, dealing with the Old Testament, is as excellent as his first. It gives a clear and lively account of Hebrew writing, earlier and later, of the formation of the Massoretic text; of the use for purposes of textual criticism of the Talmud and the Targums; and of the history of the more important versions, the Septuagint, the Syriac, and the Vulgate. Mr. Smyth's admirable clearness and simplicity will make him easily followed by the most ignorant, while his enthusiasm—the energetic interest which he contrives to convey into his style—will attract the dullest. The book is the best "easy lesson for the people in Biblical criticism" which has been written, and will do great good, but it does not profess to go behind the Massoretic text. The author is careful to state that the problems of what is called the "higher criticism" are outside the scope of his book. The full meaning of this statement will not be understood by those for whom Mr. Smyth writes, but that is not his fault.

A Key to the Psalms. Being a Tabular Arrangement, by which the Psalms are exhibited to the eye according to a general rule of composition prevailing in the Holy Scriptures. By the late Rev. Thomas Boys. Edited, with Introduction, Notes, and an Appendix on the structure of the Psalms as a whole, by the Rev. E. W. Bullinger, D.D. With Preface and Memoir, by the Rev. Sydney Thelwall. (Published by the Editor at 7, St. Paul's Churchyard.) Readers of a once well-known work, Horne's Introduction to the Scriptures, will remember, in the chapter on Parallelism, the mention of an earlier work of Mr. Boys, which bore the same title as the present, and of another work by him on certain Epistles of the New Testament. His editor remarks that "he arranged whole chapters and books, as Bishops Lowth and Jebb had arranged verses"; and that "the same orderly arrangement [is] found in Genesis, the historical books, the Gospels, and the Epistles, in Old and New Testament alike." In short, Mr. Boys saw things in a mist, and exaggerated their real proportions. It would not be fruitful to discuss his work, the translation of the Psalms being unscholarly, and the arrangement fantastic. Prof. Forbes, of Aberdeen, is a parallelist of another calibre.

Biblical Atlas and Scripture Gazetteer. With Geographical Descriptions and Copious Bible References. (Religious Tract Society.) This work is a revision of a Bible Atlas issued by the same society in 1840. The maps have been furnished by Mr. H. Courtier. The introductions have been revised, more especially on the basis of the works of Major Conder, from whom presumably the identifications in the Gazetteer are also drawn. It would be too much to say that the standard aimed at is a critical one. Advanced students will anxiously wait for Guthe's promised cheap atlas. Even to Sunday-school teachers and Bible-class scholars we incline to think that nothing short of the best information should be supplied. Why, for instance, should the late Dr. Manning be quoted on the site of Capernaum, and Canon Rawlinson alone on the tenth chapter of Genesis?

NOTES AND NEWS.

MESSRS. SAMPSON LOW will publish next week, as the first volume of a new series entitled "The Queen's Prime Ministers," The Earl of Beaconsfield, by Mr. J. A. Froude, with a portrait. It is understood that the author has received valuable assistance not only from Mr. Ralph Disraeli, but also from the Duke of Rutland and other political friends of the late premier.

MR. JOHN MURRAY announces a Life of the late Dr. Burgon, written by his friend, Dean Goulburn. It will be in two volumes, with portraits.

A SERIES of antiquarian and historical works is announced, to be commenced during the coming season, under the title of "The Camden Library." Among the subjects of the earlier volumes will be "The Antiquities of the Exchequer," "History of the Old London Theatres," "English Domestic Architecture," and a reprint of Camden's Britannia in a handy form. The series will be under the general editorship of Mr. T. F. Ordish.

MR. DAVID STOTT has ready for immediate publication a volume of translations of Choral

Odes from the Greek Dramatists, edited by Mr. Alfred Pollard. Besides versions by Mr. and Mrs. Browning, Mr. Swinburne, Dean Milman, quoted from their published works, the volume will comprise renderings specially made for this volume by Dr. Verrall, Mr. E. D. A. Morshead, Mr. Ernest Myers, and other well-known scholars. Each version is accompanied by the Greek text.

THE three next volumes of the "Heroes of the Nations" series, published by Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons, will be Gustavus Adolphus, and the Struggle of Protestantism for Existence, by Mr. C. R. L. Fletcher; Pericles, and the Golden Age of Athens, by Mr. Evelyn Abbott, the general editor of the series; and Theodorice the Goth, the Barbarian Champion of Civilisation, by Dr. Thomas Hodgkin.

MR. G. B. LONGSTAFF, well known both at the Statistical Society and on the London County Council, has collected a number of his statistical papers, dealing with social, political, and medical subjects, which will be published by Mr. Edward Stanford, with about thirty illustrative maps and diagrams.

MESSRS. RICHARD BENTLEY & SON will shortly publish a new novel from the pen of "Hugh Westbury," whose Acte has been one of the most successful works of fiction of the year. The forthcoming book is entitled The Deliverance of Robert Carter.

ARROWSMITH'S Christmas Annual for 1890, as for two or three recent years, has been written by Mr. Walter Besant. It is entitled The Demoniac.

MESSRS. F. V. WHITE & Co. announce for immediate publication: "Winter's Christmas Annual," He Went for a Soldier, by John Strange Winter; Brave Heart and True, by Florence Marryat, and Basil and Annette, by B. L. Farjeon, each in three volumes; also Reminiscences of My Life, by Gustav Freytag, in two volumes.

MR. JUSTIN MCCARTHY is writing a story, entitled "A Lying Vision," for newspaper publication through Messrs. Tillotson & Son, of Bolton. The same firm have also arranged for a story by the Marquis of Lorne, to be published early in the new year.

MESSRS. BICKERS & SON will shortly publish a more complete biography, with portrait, of the late Miss Naden than that by Mrs. Daniell attached to her essays on Induction and Deduction, recently issued by the same publishers. The biography will be edited by Mr. R. W. Hughes, and will contain contributions from Profs. Lapworth and Tilden, of the Mason Science College, and by Dr. Lewins, editor of the volume of essays above mentioned.

THE following new volumes of verse are announced for the present season by Mr. Elliot Stock: The Love Song of Barbara, by Charles J. Whitby; Lyrics of the Hills, by Charles A. Fox; David, and Other Poems, by M. H. Browne.

THE next volume in the Camelot series will be The Essays of Elia, with an introductory notice by Mr. Ernest Rhys.

MR. BERNARD QUARITCH'S annual trade sale dinner will take place on Friday next, October 17, at the Freemasons' Tavern. Among the books to be offered will be the first volume of Mr. William Morris's "Saga Library," comprising the stirring Icelandic story of Howard the Halt, Hen Thorin's Saga, and the Saga of the Banded Men; Mr. R. T. Pritchett's Smokiana, historical and ethnographical, with several hundred coloured designs of the pipes of all countries; the Jeypore Portfolios of Indian Architecture and Ornament, produced by Mr. Griggs; J. W. Bradby's Giulio Clovio, the Miniaturist; His Life, Times, and Works; Dr.

John Evans's supplement to his Coins of the Ancient Britons; and the long-expected penultimate volume of Dr. Furnivall's Quarto Shakspeare Facsimiles (to be completed in forty-three vols.). Two valuable archaeological works—T. Morgan's Romano-British Mosaic Pavements (1886), and Wallace Dunlop's Old Glass: its History and Manufacture (1882)—will at the same time be offered at reduced prices. We are informed that Mr. Morris, Dr. Furnivall, Mr. R. T. Pritchett, and Mr. Griggs will be present on the occasion as Mr. Quaritch's guests.

THE first number of the Critical Review of Theological and Philosophical Literature, edited by Prof. Salmond, will contain contributions by Canon Driver, Principal Rainy, Profs. A. B. Bruce, A. B. Davidson, Marcus Dods, Macalister, Plummer, Candlish, Laidlaw, Gibb, Iverach, Reynolds; Dr. Hutchison Stirling, Dr. Stalker, Dr. Walter Smith; the Revs. G. Adam Smith, D. M. Ross, Vernon Bartlett; and Mr. A. Taylor.

THE series of free lectures on Sunday afternoons at the South Place Institute has been recommenced this month. In continuation of last winter's series, descriptive of national life and thought throughout the world, Miss Colenso will give a lecture to-morrow (October 12) upon "The Zulus"; and among future arrangements are: "Siberia," by Prince Kropotkin; "Bulgaria," by Mr. J. G. C. Minchin; "Portugal," by Senhor J. Batalha Reis; "The Lost Tasmanian Race," by Mr. James Bonwick; and "Systems of Tribal Policy among the Bantu Race in South Africa," by Mr. John Mackenzie.

MR. J. N. ELLABY will recite Shakspeare's play of "Julius Cæsar" at the Crystal Palace on Wednesday afternoon, October 16.

DR. R. VON FLEISCHHACKER's text of Lanfranc's Cyurgie, englished about 1400 A.D., continues to surprise its readers by its early use of words thought late. No one would suppose "cellule" and "inanition" to be much older than the present century, yet there they are in Dr. von Fleischhacker's text at the end of the fourteenth. "Caustic," "cautery," and the like, which the Philological Society's collectors could get no earlier than 1540-1600, go back to 1400; and so does "brawny," for which the New English dictionary's first quotation is from Marston in 1599. We hope that our German and English editors of MSS. will hereafter keep a sharper eye on these early MSS., and print them before the Dictionary grows much older.

IN reference to the protest against Mr. Hall Caine's play on Muhammad, it may be worth while to recall the fact that about the year 1798 Coleridge began a "Mahomet" in hexameters, modelled apparently upon the "Messiah," as is shown by the first lines, "Utter the song, O my soul, the flight and return of Mahomet." But "Mahomet" seems to have been abandoned for "Wallenstein," though we do not hear of a protest from Musalmans.

PROF. MASSON's new edition of the Collected Writings of De Quincey (Edinburgh: A. & C. Black) is now approaching its end. Vol. XII. contains the first instalment of what the editor styles "tales, romances, and prose phantasies." Though the most famous of all that come under this heading—"The Spanish Military Nun," "Murder Considered as one of the Fine Arts," "The English Mail Coach," and "Suspisia de Profundis"—are reserved for the following volume, the present one has a special character, as including the whole series of De Quincey's adaptations from the German, several of which are here brought together for the first time. About the bibliographical history of most of them Prof. Masson has something interesting to tell. Notably he has been able to discover the German original of "The Fatal Marksman," De Quincey's version of "Der Freischütz," and also to announce that it first appeared in an anonymous three-volume collection of Popular Tales and Romances of the Northern Nations, published in the same year (1823) when De Quincey was contributing other German tales to the London Magazine. For the recovery of Tieck's "Love-Charm," Prof. Masson acknowledges his indebtedness to Mr. James Hogg. Meanwhile, it is worthy of note that not even this edition of De Quincey can be final, for Dr. Alexander H. Japp has quite recently been entrusted with the publication (with Mr. Heinemann) of a number of posthumous writings, including additional "Suspisia."

IN the notice of Mr. S. R. Gardiner's Student's History of England in the ACADEMY of last week, it was remarked, "No maps are given—possibly for good reasons." The reason, as we now learn, is a good one. The work, when complete in three volumes, will be accompanied by a Student's Atlas of English History, which is now being prepared by Mr. Gardiner himself, to be explanatory of the text. It is hoped that this will be published in a few months' time.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

TERM begins at the end of the present week at both Oxford and Cambridge. At Oxford, Prof. Ray Lankester will enter upon his duties as deputy Linacre professor of human and comparative anatomy; while no steps have yet been taken to fill the vacancy caused by Prof. Sayce's resignation of the deputy-professorship of comparative philology. His resignation, however, will not come into effect until after Christmas. At Cambridge, a successor to Prof. Stuart, in the chair of mechanism and applied mechanics, will be elected in November; and a new teachership in Tamil and Telugu—the two principal vernaculars of the Madras presidency—has been established by the board of Indian civil service studies.

THE Dean of Christ Church has called a meeting for next week to consider the best means of establishing a special memorial to Dr. Liddon at Oxford.

IN the list of lectures proposed by the special board for classics at Cambridge for the current term, we notice that Prof. Jebb is lecturing on "Greek Scenic Antiquities"; Prof. Mayor on "Seneca's Epistles"; Dr. Jackson on "The Fragments of Heraclitus and Parmenides," and also on "The De Anima of Aristotle"; Dr. Postgate on "Greek and Latin Phonetics"; Dr. Peile on "The Morphology of Nouns"; and Mr. Roberts on "Greek Dialects and Inscriptions."

MR. A. S. PEAKE, tutor in Hebrew at Mansfield College, has been elected to a theological fellowship at Merton College, Oxford. This is, we believe, the first link between the new institution and one of the old foundations, and also the first election of a Primitive Methodist to an Oxford fellowship.

IN connexion with the syndicate for the training of teachers, a course of twelve lectures on "The Theory of Education" will be delivered during the present term at Cambridge by Mr. H. Courthope Bowen, beginning on Wednesday, October 29. The lectures will in the main consist of brief descriptions of the modes and interrelations of mental activities, together with a more detailed application of psychological principles to the art of teaching.

THE Rev. Philip Wicksteed, who will be well known to readers of the ACADEMY as the translator of Kuenen, has been appointed warden of the new settlement at University Hall, Gordon Square. Prof. J. Estlin Carpenter's course of ten lectures, in connexion with that institution, upon "The First Three Gospels and the Early Church," will be delivered at Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand.

THE subject which Prof. Douglas has chosen for his inaugural lecture of the autumn term of the School for Modern Oriental Studies is "China and the Language of China." The lecture will be delivered at University College, Gower-street, on Tuesday next, October 14, at 5 p.m., with Dr. Erichsen, president of the college, in the chair; and the public will be admitted free.

MR. WALTER LEAF's course on "Homeric Greece," in connexion with the Chelsea centre of the London University Extension Society—the first lecture of which will be delivered at the Chelsea Town Hall on Wednesday next, October 15, at 5.15 p.m.—will deal with the following topics:—The historic basis of the Homeric poems; the origin of the Iliad and the Odyssey; the political state and religion of heroic Greece; heroic fortresses and architecture; Homeric dress, armour, and art. Mr. Leaf's lectures will be followed immediately by a course of four on the "Myths of the Homeric Cycle," by Miss Jane Harrison.

MR. WILFRID A. GILL will deliver a course of lectures during the winter on "Modern Ethics," at 13, Kensington-square (King's College Department for Ladies). The opening address will be given on Tuesday next, October 14.

THE late Sir Munguldas Nathubhoy, one of the Parsi merchant-princes of Western India, has bequeathed to the university of Bombay the residue of his property, which is estimated to amount to over six lakhs of rupees (say £60,000), for the foundation of scholarships of £500, to be awarded, by open competition, to graduates who undertake to follow up technical studies in England.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

SILENCE IN VALHALLA.

"Which things are an allegory."—GAL. iv. 24.

The feasting hath ceased in Valhalla,
The joy is all fled;
The gods have grown feeble and pallid,
And hope lieth dead.

He can never return to bless us,
Great Baldur the bright;
The whole world groaneth in darkness,
Day becometh as night.

We knew that the doom it was certain,
The Norns never lie;
That the thread of his life should be broken,
And Baldur must die.

For Loki was subtle as always,
And stronger than might
Is his craft; it slumbereth never,
In darkness or light.

The sun hath grown cold in the heavens,
The arrow it sped;
A grey pall it hath fallen upon us
Now Baldur is dead.

It availeth us little that Loki
Lies bound and in pain,
For naught can bring back the departed—
Our grief is in vain.

But the Norns they have told us all things;
The time draweth nigh
When the doom that was spoken it falleth;
There riseth a cry

From the earth—the gods do not hearken,
All silent their breath,
As calmly they gaze from Valhalla,
Awaiting their death.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

By far the most important article in the October number of the Antiquary is the account of Leicester Castle, by Mrs. Chaworth Musters. It is just the sort of historical sketch which we require—and so seldom get—with regard to our historic buildings. These old buildings have been much modernised, but still a great part of the original work remains. We cannot even guess when first there was a castle at Leicester. It is probable that the spot on which the buildings now stand was fortified by a wooden stockade long before anything we now see was in being. "To come down to comparatively modern days," as Mrs. Chaworth Musters says, "it was built by Simon de Montfort, the great Earl of Leicester, in the thirteenth century." The memory of John of Gaunt, and many others of the great race of Plantagenets and their kinsfolk, also gathers round these walls; and yet, if the most strenuous exertions be not made, they will soon be swept away to serve the purposes of a railway company. In the hope of doing some good we transfer a portion of Mrs. Chaworth Musters' protest to our columns:

"And now will our readers believe that a group of buildings so ancient, so peaceful, so historically connected with the glories of our land—religiously, politically, and socially—are already marked out for destruction by a railway? The proposed new line of the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company is projected to run through the great hall diagonally, just shaving St. Mary's Church by a few yards, levelling the grassy mount on which stood the keep, and whether entirely destroying or only running close past the wall of the Trinity Hospital I am not aware; but, of course, the scheme, if carried out, means the utter destruction of this little group of historical buildings."

We are glad to know that influential people of the county are stirring themselves to hinder, if it be possible, this contemplated act of wantonness. The Rev. E. Maule Cole contributes a valuable paper on "The Entrenchments on the Yorkshire Wolds," and Mr. S. John Hope discourses on the recent excavations at Silchester. Mr. R. C. Hope continues his interesting series of papers on Holy Wells, having now reached the counties of Somerset and Stafford.

A CATALOGUE OF OLD ENGLISH BALLADS.

THE private and limited impression of a book which, however intrinsically valuable, must still be caviare to the general, has, a certain advantage. It communicates a flavour of rarity and curiosity which ensure the preservation of the work even under circumstances adverse to the safety of most printed volumes. Thus the student of the future will profit by the modesty of the scholar of to-day; but the students of our own time remain unluckily ignorant of much that has been done to assist research. There are many so called "private impressions," cleverly designated thus in order to attract a multitude of purchasers; but we allude only to books which are virtually inaccessible to the public. One of these is the volume which has evoked the present notice. It has, by a fortunate chance, become known to the writer of these lines; and he is thus enabled to record the existence of a bibliographical work of very high interest, which reflects credit upon the author's mastery of his subject and the scientific exactness of his methods. The title runs as follows:

"Bibliotheca Lindesiana. Catalogue of a Collection of English Ballads of the XVIIth and XVIIIth Centuries, printed for the most part in black letter. Privately printed, mcccxc."

The book is a thick quarto volume of over 700 pages, finely printed at the Aberdeen University Press; and it contains a wonderfully elaborate catalogue of the English ballads (1466 in number), which in the form of broad-sheets constitute a valuable portion of Lord Crawford's famous library. He is himself the unassisted author of the work, which is compiled in such a manner as to evince not only a full acquaintance with the history of England during the reign of the Stuart sovereigns, but also a perfect mastery of the minutiae of bibliographical science; not to speak of the devoted and indefatigable industry without which the task would have been impossible. The alphabetical order which he has chosen for the ground-arrangement is determined by the first line of each ballad; but full indices of the intitulations, or catch-word titles, facilitate all necessary reference. The second of two appendices furnishes a complete list of the ballads which are found in the Erring and Huth collections—both of recognised importance; the first appendix contains a correct and fully amplified description of the ballads which Thomas Thackeray announced as for sale in 1685, in a rough list of titles which had not hitherto been wholly identified. Amongst the indexes is one which specifies the ascertained period of each printer's career, the earliest and latest dates at which he is known to have been at work. When we remember that most of the black-letter broad-sheets are undated, we recognise the value of this addition. The catalogue is one of which any bibliographer might be proud. We can only regret that it has been privately printed. Only a hundred copies were struck off.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A FRAGMENT OF A LOST GREEK POET.

Queen's College, Oxford: Oct. 4, 1890.

In the ACADEMY of last April (p. 273), I mentioned that a splendid Greek tomb had been found by the natives at Dalgat near Deshlût, in Central Egypt, not far from the site of Phylaké Thèbaiké. An inscription in Greek on the breast of one of the mummies states that it belonged to a certain Sarapous, who died in the 14th year of Augustus (13 B.C.). Among the Greek papyri discovered along with the mummy is a fragment, now in private hands at Siût, of which I was allowed to make a hasty copy. It seems to belong to some lost comedy, and contains several curious words. The beginnings of the lines are unfortunately lost. It is written in capitals; but I publish it, for the convenience of the printers, in cursive characters, and with the words divided from one another, though, like the original, without stops or diacritical marks:

... δια την Αθηναίην
... τι και συ τον ποδα ψωρη
... [ο π]ους ο λακτισμας υμας
... ηκον ησθ υπ [ω]μυλην
... Κερδωνος εστι ην ουτω
... s εκειτ αν ως σαφως κηται
... [ε]πτα δαρκινους τουδε
... προς θυρην κιχλ[ι]ουσα
... πτε κητερον χρεην
... λιη[ν] κ[α]τοιικην ελκιν
... οι δουλ[οι] αδε πεμπετε
... i προς ν ... τη ενατη παυτας
... αρκινια την γαρ ουν βατην
... αιναον φρονουντα και ραπτιν
... ενυπνιον
... [α]λλα μεχρι τεο κιση
... [τον]δε χωρον αυον η αρπυτι
... μεχρις ευ ηλιος θαλψηι

On another fragment are the words:

... ει θελεις λυχνον
... τον χωρον ες νομην.

The Egyptian substitution of ι for ει will be noticed, also the new word αρπυτι for αρρυπτον. In the fourth line I suppose δμυλλαν to be intended.

THE IMPERIAL UNIVERSITY OF WARSAW.

Warsaw: September 20, 1890.

On September 11 (August 30, O.S.) the university of Warsaw completed the twenty-first year of its existence. It was opened under peculiar circumstances. In accordance with an Imperial ukase, addressed to the Senate on June 8—20, 1869, the Russian language was introduced as obligatory for all lectures, examinations, proceedings, and public speeches. The university, like the others in Russia, was divided into four faculties (philology, law, medicine, natural science and mathematics), with the rector as its head, and the congregation, partly as a consultative, partly as a deliberative body. The rector was to be nominated by the Minister of Public Instruction; the right of election to vacant chairs was at first limited, and about two years ago entirely abolished. Now only the deans or presidents of faculties (four in number) are elected.

During the year just ended there were in the university 60 professors (42 ordinary, 18 extraordinary), 5 readers, and 1164 students, of whom 719 belonged to the Roman Catholic Church, 234 to the Orthodox religion, 175 were Jews, and 36 Lutherans or members of the Reformed Church. Divided according to faculties, philology had 53 students (of whom 37 had previously been educated in seminaries, the rest in classical gymnasia); law, 389; natural science and mathematics, 143 (39 educated before in seminaries*); and medicine, 579. For encouraging competition among students, more than £6700 (53,567 roubles) was awarded in the form of scholarships, prizes, &c.

As regards the scientific activity of the university during the year 1890, I can only mention the following important works published by some of our professors: C. Grot's "The History of Hungary and the Slavs in the Twelfth Century" treats of an interesting period (1141-1173) of Hungarian history and the political relations of the Magyars to their Eastern neighbours. Prof. N. Lubowich produced a learned book "On the Beginning of Catholic Reaction, and the Decline of the Reformation in Poland" from unprinted documents in the Vatican Library and the State Records at Venice. Students of Polish history will find useful an elaborate Index by F. Wierzbowski:

"Polonica XV. ac XVI. SS.: sive catalogus librorum res polonicas tractantium vel a polonis conscriptorum arte typografica impressorum, qui in bibliotheca Universitatis Caesariae Varsoviensis asservantur."

Prof. Asarevich has completed his "System of Roman Law." Vols. I. and II.; Didinski his "Latin-Russian Dictionary; or, the Sources of Roman Law." Prof. Tauber, who has been investigating the condition of surgery in the different countries of Europe, has just published the first part of his work, dealing with "the English and Scotch Schools of Surgery." He gives an interesting account of the different schools he visited in 1885, and of the eminent surgeons (including Lister) with whom he was brought into contact. The medical faculty of Edinburgh struck Prof. Tauber as being on a somewhat higher level, in the scientific departments, than the London schools, and he especially remarks on the high position held by it in the Scotch capital as compared with the other faculties.

B. ALEXANDRENKO.

* The sons of clergymen being educated in seminaries cannot become members of another faculty, or university, except that of Tomsk, where they may attend the medical lectures. In Warsaw they are admitted only to the two faculties of philology and natural science and mathematics.

JUNIUS'S TRANSCRIPTS OF OLD ENGLISH TEXTS.

London: October 5, 1890.

Mr. H. Logeman, in a letter under the above title in the ACADEMY of September 27, takes some remarks of mine in the Introduction to my edition of Alfred's Cura Pastoralis, and by detaching them from the context and altering "Junius has swerved from the path of literal accuracy in a few unimportant particulars" into "Junius sometimes swerved. . . ." has transformed a definite statement about the relation of one of Junius's transcripts to its original into a misleading statement about Junius's method of transcribing in general—a method which bears a striking resemblance to that of Mr. Logeman himself, who, as we see, alters "has swerved" into "swerved," and interpolates a "sometimes" of his own. If he had quoted my words accurately, any English reader would have seen that I was speaking of one particular transcript.

What I said was that, in order to test the accuracy of Junius's copy of Ci, I collated it with a few fragments of the original MS. which had escaped the great fire in the Cottonian library, and also compared those parts of Junius's MS. which were taken from the extant MS. H. I then summed up the results, and went on to say "Junius has, however, swerved, &c." and to give details of Junius's alterations of his originals. Mr. Logeman's letter leaves the general question exactly where it was before. He merely says over again what has been known to me and every other Old-English specialist for the last fifteen years—viz., that Junius, in many of his transcripts—especially, I may add, of Glossaries—makes alterations, omissions, and additions. Mr. Logeman throws no light on the rationale of Junius's methods, or on the question why he followed a totally different one in his transcript of the Cura Pastoralis MSS.

Mr. Logeman does not like Junius's spelling cyrice. But he must admit that if Junius gives that form in his transcript, and quotes cirice as a divergent reading from the other MSS., there is a strong probability that Ci did have the form cyrice. I do not say that this is the case; but it was evidently Mr. Logeman's duty to find out whether it was so before writing his perfectly useless and misleading letter, and wasting half-an-hour of my valuable time in answering it.

A BLASPHEMY CASE IN POLAND.

Oxford: October 4, 1890.

I hope you will allow me a few words in reply to Mr. Naaké, although I am afraid you have but little space in the ACADEMY for these obscure points.

Mr. Naaké wants to show that I have copied two short sentences from a book the name of which I have concealed. The sentences he reproduces occur almost verbatim in Krasinski's Historical Sketch of the Rise, Progress, and Decline of the Reformation in Poland, a book the use of which I have freely acknowledged in the article. I am afraid that Mr. Naaké has not read it, or he would not have made his insinuation. The other work he mentions I have never seen. It does not seem to have occurred to him that Krasinski could have repeated himself.

By a slip of the pen I wrote Christopher instead of Casimir, and it must be remembered that I only cite the name once. I followed Krasinski in the account of the punishment; he cites Bishop Zaluski, a contemporary we must remember, who expressly says:

"After recantation the culprit was conducted to the scaffold, where the executioner tore with a burning iron the tongue and the mouth . . . ."

finally, himself, that monster of his century, this delcide, was thrown into the expiatory flames; expiatory if such a crime may be atoned for."

We see, therefore, that Mr. Naaké's talk about inaccuracies, his insinuations about my plagiarism and concealment of the sources of it, are all capable of being reduced to the detection of a slip of the pen in once calling a man who was named Casimir, Christopher.

THE LIFE OF LORD BYRON.

London: October 6, 1890.

It seems to me as if Mr. Roden Noel were a gentleman very hard to please, and I do not feel as if it were any business of mine to even try to please him. He says: "It was my first duty in this little book to write a biography, and not a criticism." Who ever thought anything else? I certainly gave what I consider very substantial praise to the biography, and only condemned the criticism, not indeed as bad, but merely as faulty and insufficient. Where then is the bone of contention between us? Is it that I have not pointed out that, as Mr. Noel says, "the distinctive note of Byron as poet is his iconoclasm, his revolutionary spirit?" But surely I could not say everything, and did not profess to say more than a very little in my short notice of Mr. Noel's small book. But if I had to write ten times as much about Byron, the last thing I should have thought it necessary to say was what Mr. Noel thinks the most needful thing to be said. Everybody knows about Byron's "iconoclasm," and, in a sense, "his revolutionary spirit"; but what everybody does not know, and what I do not believe, is that "he is, before all, the poet of revolt." I should have thought this phrase much more applicable to the greater poet and far better man, his friend Shelley. Again, where did I say, or how could I be supposed to think, that Byron's "relations with women and men friends" should not be dealt with fully. I simply thought that, as regards his Venice life, they were dealt with a trifle too fully. However, if it be any satisfaction to Mr. Noel, I am ready to concede that probably no great harm has been done in this matter.

I do not know that I need say much about Mr. Noel's personal remark. I find it rather hard to enter into the constitution of that peculiar mind that can conceive of me as being, or having become, a Tory. I am, above and before all things, an Irish Nationalist, and what I am after that it is scarcely for me to set forth in the columns of the ACADEMY. Mr. Roden Noel, who apparently knows nothing about me, must look for my record elsewhere.

JOHN O'LEARY.

POETRY AND SCIENCE IN FOLK-LORE.

London: Oct. 2, 1890.

The Rev. Percy Myles, in a review of Lady Wilde's Ancient Cures, Charms, and Usages (ACADEMY, Sept. 27), makes complimentary mention of my little compilation, Fairy and Folk Tales of the Irish Peasantry. He misunderstands, however, what I said about scientific folk-lore in the Introduction. I do not want the fairy-tale gatherer to tell us "what he thinks he might have heard, or what he thinks his audience would like to hear." But I deeply regret when I find that some folk-lore is merely scientific, and lacks the needful subtle imaginative sympathy to tell his stories well. There are innumerable little turns of expression and quaint phrases that in the mouth of a peasant give half the meaning, and often the whole charm. The man of science is too often a person who has exchanged his soul for a formula; and when he captures a folk-tale, nothing remains with him for all his trouble but a wretched lifeless thing with the down rubbed off and a pin thrust through its once all-living body. I object to the "honest folk-lore," not because his versions are accurate, but because they are inaccurate, or rather incomplete. What lover of Celtic lore has not been filled with a sacred rage when he came upon some exquisite story, dear to him from childhood, written out in newspaper English and called science? To me, the ideal folk-lore is Mr. Douglas Hyde. A tale told by him is quite as accurate as any "scientific" person's rendering; but in dialect and so forth he is careful to give us the most quaint, or poetical, or humorous version he has heard. I am inclined to think also that some concentration and elaboration of dialect is justified, if only it does not touch the fundamentals of the story. It is but a fair equivalent for the gesture and voice of the peasant tale-teller. Mr. Hyde has, I believe, done this in his marvellous Teig O'Kane, with the result that we have a story more full of the characteristics of true Irish folk-lore than all the pages given to Ireland from time to time in the Folk-lore Journal.

SCIENCE.

THE ORIGIN OF THE NEUTER GENDER IN INDO-GERMANIC LANGUAGES.

Die Pluralbildungen der Indogermanischen Neutra. Von Johannes Schmidt. (Weimar: Böhlau.)

THE late Georg Curtius, in the fourth chapter of his last work, Zur Kritik der neuesten Sprachforschung, commented unfavourably on the reluctance shown by the "new school" of philologists to explain the formative elements of words. A good many of us have probably sympathised somewhat with Curtius on this point. The old theory that λέγω came from *legomi, "speak—I," was, at any rate, a positive statement; and there is something unsatisfying in the new view that λέγω = *λεγω, when no one has the least idea what the final α may mean. At the same time, it is to be remembered: first, that it is not the wholly unsupported hypotheses which aid the advance of science; and, secondly, that the excessive caution of the new school is partly a reaction from the excessive dogmatism of their predecessors. One does not expect bold theorising on inflexions from men who have just shaken off the extraordinary views once prevalent as to the personal endings of the Greek middle. When they have shown rashness, it has naturally been in other directions—in the matter of analogy, for instance, and perhaps in an over-estimate of the term "phonetic law." At the same time, it would be unfair, except in an epigram, to regard the "new school" as the embodiment merely of reaction. On many points the new views are not the antithesis of the old ones, but something quite different. The question as to the origin of the formative or inflexional elements in words, which is the question raised by Dr. Schmidt's last book, is one such. It is true that Brugmann, in his reply to Curtius (p. 119), allows the possibility of explaining suffixes by what may be called the agglutinative method, and both there and in his Greek Grammar (second edition, p. 145) he says that -mi and some other of the personal suffixes of the verb are probably pronominal in origin. But the general tendency at present is to explain the inflexional endings by the aid of analogy. The Ursprache, on this hypothesis, was not originally rich in inflexions; but confusion as to terminations multiplied suffixes, and perfects and aorists grew more numerous. It is thus that Brugmann and Osthoff, in two very different ways, explain the perfect in -κα, that Thurneysen explains the imperative in -τω, and Wackernagel the aorist in -θην. And it is thus that Dr. Schmidt in the present volume seeks to account for the origin of the neuter gender in the Indogermanic languages. This, of course, is not quite what Curtius meant by "explanations of the formative elements in words." When we have shown δέδωκα to be a mistaken aorist from δώκω, ἐδόθην a tense formed from a misunderstood second person, δόμεν a locative and δομένα a dative, we have still to explain our dative and locative and second person suffix and aorist. Dr. Schmidt has, therefore, hardly the right to say, as he does in his preface, that his book is an answer to Curtius's criticism and a proof that the new school, or rather that he himself (for Dr. Schmidt holds rather apart from the Junggrammatiker), does desire to explain inflexional suffixes. The difference between him and Curtius on this point is perhaps rather a matter of logic than of philology. It is the question whether the historical method can give philosophically adequate "explanations" of things. Meanwhile, the ordinary man will probably say that, whatever be the ultimate explanation of inflexion, hypotheses such as those indicated above are most useful. It is not until we have cleared away the subsequent accretions of analogy that we can hope to "explain" the inflexions of the Ursprache. And Dr. Schmidt's book undoubtedly contains one of these hypotheses.

He starts from two well-known facts: first the σχῆμα Ἀττικόν, which he considers Indogermanic, as traces of it occur in the Vedas, the Gathas, and elsewhere; and, secondly, the formation of neuter plurals corresponding to masculine singulars, σῆτος σῆτα, locus loca, Slavonic kamen (stone) kamna. Hence he proceeds to argue that these plurals are in reality collectives, in fact collective feminines, and supports his view by the analogy of the Arabic "broken plurals." The theory is further strengthened by the proof (1) that collective singulars do take the place of plurals (πρόβασις for πρόβατα, &c.); and (2) that every formation of the neuter plural known to have existed in the Ursprache corresponds to a feminine nominative singular formation found in the same class of nouns. The body of the book is occupied with the discussion of these plurals. How far Dr. Schmidt has proved his main theses is perhaps a question which individuals will answer in different ways.

But there can be no doubt that philologists will have to take account of his theories. They form a working hypothesis which may be amended, may perhaps be ultimately rejected, but which cannot be neglected.

The book, however, is a good deal more than a treatise on the Indogermanic neuter plural. The author's vast learning enables him to touch on problems in all the Indogermanic languages, and his pages are full of new and ingenious solutions. Thus it is suggested that ducenti, lumbi, peni are really duals, mistaken for masculine plurals and inflected accordingly. This is the reason why lumbus (a later singular) is masculine, while the parallel forms in German and Slavonic are entirely feminine. Other points of importance with which Dr. Schmidt deals are the formation of δνομα, where he seems successful, at least in rejecting the usual explanation of a stem in -aro-, the etymology of δμμα and other words denoting the eyes, the forms of κῆρας and κάρα, the Greek adverbs in -s, έκας, ἀρτεμας, &c. No less attention is paid to difficulties of inflexion presented by Teutonic, Indian, and Slavonic languages; but upon these the present writer cannot speak with special knowledge, and "general" criticism would be impertinent. I have, however, no hesitation in recommending the book as one of the most valuable contributions to philology which has been made of late years, and as well worthy of the high reputation which its author enjoys.

F. HAVERFIELD.

MATHEMATICAL BOOKS.

American Journal of Mathematics. (Baltimore.) No. 4 of Vol. XII. contains two papers on "Confocal Bicircular Quartics," by F. Franklin (pp. 323-336), and on "The Theory of Matrices," by H. Taber (pp. 337-396). The latter paper "originated in an investigation upon the development of Clifford's geometrical algebras; the consideration of the linear vector functions of these algebras led me to think of investigating the theory of matrices viewed as linear vector operators." The first part "contains only the elementary notions and theories developed from the point of view of the matrix as an operator." In the second part it is "shown that the whole theory of matrices may be regarded as contained in the theory of Clifford's geometrical algebras." The author, at the time of writing, was not acquainted with the late Mr. Buchheim's paper on "The Theory of Matrices" (L. Math. Soc. Procs. vol. 16). He states, on an examination of the aforesaid paper, that he has treated the whole subject in more detail and more systematically than Mr. Buchheim. Vol. XIII., No. 1, opens with an interesting investigation by M. W. Haskell entitled "ueber die zu der curve  $\lambda^2\mu + \mu^2\nu + \nu^2\lambda = 0$  im projectiven Sinne gehörende mehrfache Ueberdeckung der Ebene" (pp. 1-51). This is illustrated by numerous figures and two large plates, and has, moreover, a good index of contents. Prof. Cayley, in a note on "A Soluble Quintic Equation" (pp. 53-58) shows that the roots of an equation discussed by Mr. Young (Vol. X. pp. 99-130) can be put into much simpler forms than those given in that memoir. The closing paper on "The Theory of Substitution-Groups and its Applications to Algebraic Equations" (pp. 59-96) is in great part a reproduction of a course of lectures delivered by Oskar Bolza at the Johns Hopkins University, January-February, 1889. It is an elementary introduction to the theory of substitution-groups and its application to Galois's theory of algebraic equations, and is likely to be helpful to students. An excellent likeness of Prof. Cayley faces the opening page.

Theory of Differential Equations. Part I. Exact Equations and Pfaff's Problem. By Dr. A. R. Forsyth. (Macmillan.) Dr. Forsyth, in the preface to his Treatise on Differential Equations, pointed out that, though he had tried to make the discussion of the various parts of the subject as full as possible, yet that treatise did not profess to be complete. He then indicated some of the parts which had been omitted, and expressed a hope of giving in another volume an account of some of these. The present volume in part fulfils this hope, though it really takes up a small portion of his omissions, so widely and diligently has the subject been studied. Lately a part has been ably handled in Dr. Craig's Treatise on Linear Differential Equations, of which Vol. I. has appeared. Dr. Forsyth is a most thorough investigator, and handles his difficult subject with consummate mastery of every detail, so that a perusal of his work affects one with wonder at his skill in duly subordinating the successive steps of his argument. This skill on his part, however, will not allow a reader to be careless, and many times have we had to return to some previous point to which we had safely got before getting all the steps well in view. The work is not composed for the ordinary Cambridge student; it is a production of much higher merit, and will raise Dr. Forsyth to a more exalted place than even he had attained. The students for Part III. will have, we presume, to master the methods here given and to study the few illustrative examples which are discussed. A most useful index enables the student to find his way to what is discussed in the text and what he need not look for.

Notes on the Application of the Theory of Elliptic Transformation to the Formation of Semi-Covariants and Semi-Invariants. By J. Griffiths (Oxford). Mr. Griffiths, in these pages (18), gives some further elegant results he has obtained in a direction with which students of his previous papers are familiar (cf. L. Math. Soc. Procs. vol. xx., &c., and Reprint from Educational Times, vol. li. appendix ii.).

Examination Papers in Trigonometry. By G. H. Ward. (Bell.) This is a volume of the publisher's School Examination Series, and contains 120 papers, each paper being composed of seven questions (more or less subdivided). What is wanted in such a book is careful graduation as to difficulty and variety in the subject-matter of the questions. Mr. Ward has succeeded in these two directions; and his book will form a useful pendant to the text-book in the way of supplying questions for home-work, or for testing the student's progress. In addition, there are eighty-four questions in order upon trigonometrical book-work.

Junior School Algebra. By W. S. Beard. (Longmans.) We need not beat about the bush, but say right out that this is a good book for school use, and is well suited "to meet the requirements of the Oxford and Cambridge Junior Local Examinations, the College of Preceptors," &c. There are specimen examination papers, and the answers are given at the end.

A Shilling Book of Arithmetic for Elementary Schools. By the Rev. J. B. Lock. (Macmillan.) To adopt the wise man's words, we may say of making many Arithmetics there is no end, and much study of them is a weariness to the flesh. Mr. Lock, however, is a skilful caterer for the market, and in this handy little volume has provided sound food for his customers and plenty of it. The foundation is his Arithmetic for Schools, but he has diverged here and there to meet the requirements of the New Code. The work is clearly printed, and the copy in our hands is furnished with answers to the numerous examples.

Elementary Arithmetic. By C. Pendlebury and W. S. Beard. (Bell.) Yet another Arithmetic! This is elementary in fact as well as in title. The exercises are well chosen for the end in view; and, supplemented by judicious viva voce teaching, the book should serve as a suitable introduction to Mr. Pendlebury's larger work. The answers follow the text.

Sandhurst Mathematical Papers for Admission into the Royal Military College for the Years 1881-9. By E. J. Brooksmith. (Macmillan.) This is a collection which is likely to be as useful as we predicted the editor's previous collection of "Woolwich Mathematical Papers" would be. What is required in the way of editing has been well done, and, further, Mr. Brooksmith has appended the answers.

THE ZODIAC AND CYCLES OF BABYLONIA AND THEIR CHINESE DERIVATIVES.

London: Oct. 6, 1890.

Last year, in the Babylonian and Oriental Record I gave a detailed list of more than one hundred items showing, I think to demonstration, that the oldest civilisation of China was borrowed from that of Elam and Chaldaea, and dates for the most part from the middle of the third millennium B.C. The collective importance of these items may be judged from the fact that the derivation of the Chinese characters does not count for more than one unit in the total.

Perhaps some readers of the ACADEMY will be interested in the further advance I have now to record in similar identifications.

The evidence afforded by the Chinese cycles, months, and zodiacs deserves special attention. It was in the ACADEMY, on September 1, 1883, that I published my first attempt at identifying the words of the Chinese cycle of ten with the ten numerals in Sumero-Akkadian. Since then, better readings of the latter and more correct sounds of the former have been obtained, and the evidence has become much stronger and more convincing.

So far as concerns the cycle of twelve, I have shown that the full names for it which appear in the Erh-ya vocabulary (500 B.C.), and in the She-Ki (150 B.C.) are identical in some cases, and obvious corruptions in others, of the old Semitic nomenclature of the Babylonian months before the reform of the calendar. As to the ordinary names of the duodenary cycle, it is only recently that I have been able to identify them with those of the Babylonian zodiac in their shorter forms.

The evidence is somewhat difficult to explain briefly, as must always be the case with borrowings from one civilisation by another. We must remember that we stand several thousands of years after the event, and that one of the parties has continued its evolution with inevitable modifications, while the other has remained crystallised in the inscribed tablets of Assyro-Babylonia. Let us remember also that Chinese orthoepy has no r, and that there are no finals s, sh, z, b, p, l. For the present the identification, except in a few cases, cannot go beyond similarity in words; the respective objects of the Babylonian symbols are little known, and on the Chinese side many ancient meanings of the signs have been lost.

SUMERIAN.	ANCIENT CHINESE.
I. Offspring = TÊ	TE or TŪ = child
II. Twins = MASH	? mod. tcheu (unknown).
MASH
III. A crab? LAMGA	DZAM mod. yin (an unknown beast).
OF NAMGARU

IV. Water? = ME	MO, mod. mao (unknown).
V. Growth? = SHERU	TCHAN, mod. teh'en = pregnant.
VI. Empty? = ZAB	TSE, mod. sz (unknown).
VII. A dagger? = GIR	GU, mod. Wu = a club, a spear?
VIII. Leafy top of a tree = PA	VE, mod. Wei = upper-sprout of a tree.
IX. Sea-goat? = SAHU	TZAN, mod. shén (unknown).
X. A dripping vase = GU	YU, a vase full.
XI. (Unknown) = ZIB	SUH (unknown).
XII. A Ram? = KU	HAI, a quadruped, a pig?

It will be seen that, within the limits of Chinese phonetics, the identification is pretty clear in all but two cases, and that in no case where the meaning is known or probable on both sides is there any opposition between them. Moreover, the comparison shows that the selection of the well-known symbols of the zodiac had not reached its completion when the knowledge of the above list spread eastwards. In Nos. 2, 3, 5, 10, 12 only were they fixed.

Another of the Chinese cycles is traceable to a Babylonian origin. The twelve ts'e, which mark the twelve places where the sun and moon come into conjunction, and are thus in some degree analogous to our signs of the zodiac, agree phonetically in nine cases out of twelve, and in a remarkable manner, with the non-Semetic readings of the Babylonian signs of the month.

PĀLI "ASUROPA" AND "ĀSULOPA" OF THE ASOKA INSCRIPTIONS.

Dedham, Essex: Oct. 6, 1890.

Dr. Grierson's reference to the Asoka inscriptions (ACADEMY, October 14) is most acceptable. There is no doubt as to the connexion of the two words asuropa and āsulopa. The Dhāuli det. ed. i. 10 reads—"imehi cu jatehi no saṃ-patipajati isāya āsulopena nithuliyena," &c., which Prof. Senart renders as follows: "Mais il est des dispositions avec les quelles on ne réussit pas: ce sont l'envie, le manque de persévérance, la rudesse," &c.

The nouns isā, āsulopa, nithuriya correspond to Pāli issā, "envy, ill-will," asuropa, "anger," nithuriya, "harshness."

But "anger" is but one of the meanings attached to asuropa; it has also the sense of "impatience," "want of forbearance," as in the following passage in Dhammasaṅgani 1341: "Yā khaṇti khamantā adhivāsanaṭā acandittam anasuropo attamanatā cittassa—ayam vuccati khaṇti." Here anasuropa corresponds exactly to ānāsulopa in the Asoka inscription Dh. det. i. 12.

The great difficulty is with the initial vowel. Should it be short or long? The shortening of an initial long vowel is uncommon in Pāli, while the lengthening of a short one is not rare in the Asoka inscriptions. The form āsulopa does not settle the question as to the original form. A-suropa may have originally meant "lack of good nature," i.e., ill-nature, bad temper, want of forbearance, where **su-ropa* = "good-nature" would be opposed to **viropa*, = "ill-nature." Cf. Sk. virāpa, "wicked, deformity." If āsuropa be the true reading, the second element ropa may come from the root rup, "to break, pain," which Pāli possesses in the passive ruppati = ruppati.

Dr. Kern's ingenious emendation of rosa cannot, of course, stand before the reading furnished by the Pāli texts.

SCIENCE NOTES.

Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal. Vol. LIX. Part II., No. 1, 1890. Supplement No. 1. Proceedings January, February, and March, 1890. These parts of the publications of the Asiatic Society of Bengal contain a memoir on the gestation of some sharks and lays, by Alfred Alcock; descriptions of seven new Indian Amphipods with figures, by G. M. Giles; a catalogue of the carabid insects of the Oriental region, by E. T. Atkinson, extending to 126 closely printed pages; descriptions of the pupae of two Indian Nemeobid butterflies, by L. de Nicéville; a notice of a Bengali Brahmin, who obtained a high position in the Buddhist hierarchy in the eleventh century A.D., from whose writings we make the following extract:

"Let kings punish, let learned men deride, and let relations forsake me, yet O father Jina, I cannot live a moment without thee—you are my father, mother, brother, sister; you are my fast friend in danger, O dear one, you are my lord, my preceptor who imparts to me knowledge, as sweet as nectar. You are my wealth, my enjoyment, my pleasure, my affluence, my greatness, my reputation, my knowledge and my life. You are my all, O all-knowing Buddha."

In meteorology there is a curious article on the occasional inversion of the temperature relations between the hills and plains of Northern India, by John Eliot. The last February number contains an elaborate anniversary address by the President, Col. J. Waterhouse, extending to 80 pages.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

SIR LEPEL GRIFFIN presided, at the German Athenaeum, on Monday, October 6, over a meeting of promoters of the International Congress of Orientalists to be held in London in September, 1891. Among the foreign delegates present were Prof. Jules Oppert and Dr. Nordau, who addressed the meeting on behalf of the French members, assuring it of their cordial support. Similar promises of co-operation were given on behalf of the German members by Prof. Carl Abel, who had come over specially to represent the growing feeling among German orientalists in favour of the London congress. The following names were then added to the committee, as a result of letters circulated among the signatories: As president, Sir Patrick Colquhoun; as vice-presidents, Sir Lepel Griffin, Sir James Redhouse, Sir F. Richard Burton, Dr. W. H. Bellew, and Dr. G. W. Leitner; and as members of committee, Mr. H. C. Stephens, Mr. Howorth, Col. R. Poore, Col. Fishwick, Gen. Forlong, Dr. Adler, Dr. Phéné, Dr. A. Cates, Dr. H. Baynes, Prof. Platt, Prof. Whitehouse, Prof. Jones, Prof. Marshall, Prof. T. Whitton-Davis, Prof. Evans, Mr. Stuart Glennie, Mr. Israel Davies, Mr. W. Irvine, Mr. H. H. Risley, and Rai B. K. Lahiri. Dr. G. R. Badenoch, Mr. Hyde Clarke, Prof. C. Abel, and Mr. W. Fooks were appointed to assist Dr. Leitner, the organising secretary. The sectional committees were then appointed, and the adhesions of several governments and of academies and learned societies were reported. The number of signatories has now reached 350, or forty more than at the London congress of 1874; twenty-four countries are represented.

PART II. of the Transactions of the Philological Society for 1889-90 (Kegan Paul & Co.) prints several papers recently read before the society. Among them are two by Prof. Skeat: one dealing with English words of West Indian origin, and incidentally giving some curious information about the Mexican language; the other being a further instalment of corrections and supplements to his English Etymological Dictionary. The most important English words derived from Mexican are chilli, chocolate, cacao (cocoa), jalap, and tomato. This last is tomatl in Mexican, and tomate in Spanish, the final o in English being apparently due to a preconceived idea that Spanish words ought to end thus. Mr. E. F. Wharton's "Loan-words in Latin" should be studied by those who may find themselves unable to accept the authoritative results presented in his Etyma Latina. His statistics are very interesting. Finally, nearly two-thirds of this Part consists of an Appendix, containing Dr. Leon Kellner's Introduction to Caxton's Blanchardyn and Eglantine for the Early English Text Society, in which he treats exhaustively of Caxton's syntax and arrangement of words. Incidentally, the Viennese scholar defends Caxton from the charge of being only a servile translator.

BURMESE COINAGE AND CURRENCY.

I.

Simla: Sept. 3, 1890.

I FOUND, soon after my arrival in Upper Burma about four years ago, that great interest attached to the coinage and currency of the country, as no coinage, properly so-called, had existed before 1861. I was therefore living among a people of considerable civilisation who had but recently been introduced to the use of coins, who must consequently be familiar with methods of barter and trade without a coinage, and among whom must be many relics of pre-coinage days. My official duties were many and engrossing, and I had very little leisure to devote to coin collecting or to the study of local customs; but I was so fortunate as to gather specimens of currency sufficient in number and complete enough to illustrate what may be called the whole evolution of coinage. These are just now deposited for safety in the Indian Museum at Calcutta, and await detailed examination and description, which I regret that continued pressure of official work prevents my undertaking at present. As, however, I believe the collection illustrates facts of exceptional interest to numismatists, it has occurred to me that a cursory description thereof may be of value to many readers of the ACADEMY. I say that the description will be of value because, so far as I know, the collection enables us to study for the first time the currency of a nation immediately before and immediately after the introduction of a system of regular coinage.

The Burmese coinage was introduced by King Mindon, the father of King Thibaw whom we deposed, about 1861, although some of his coins—after a fashion which I have noticed elsewhere as being common in India, and which has been noticed also in the coinage of Bulgaria—bear date 1852, which was the year of his accession. Previous to this the only "coins" of Burma—excluding, of course, Arakan and Pegu—that I have heard of are the mysterious "fish coin" of 1781, and the tokens brought to Calcutta by Cox in 1796. Sir Arthur Phayre had seen one of the former, and took it to be a token to be buried in the foundation chamber of a pagoda; but I have two more, found in Mandalay, which makes me think they are real coins of King Bodawphagā. The latter were avowedly sacred tokens. The argument, therefore, is that any Burman resident in Upper Burma who is, say, over forty years of age must have in his or her (for the women are the principal hucksters) youth habitually dealt in an uncoined currency.

This uncoined currency my specimens prove to have been:

(1) Lumps of metal whose fineness could only be known by actual rough assay or by appearance.

(2) Lumps of metal whose fineness, but not weight, was attested by a stamp or mark.

(3) Irregular tokens.

Assay was, and is still, carried on by recognised jewellers and assay masters in the usual Indian style with wax and touchstone, and by comparing the touch with that of pieces of recognised or ascertained standard. Value is estimated by reference to silver standards, i.e. a piece of gold or copper is said to weigh so many rupees and annas (strictly tickals and mās, or tenths of a tickal), and its value is found by simple multiplication, with a deduction for alloy, or by division, as the case may be. A year ago at Mandalay gold was from 29 to 32 times the value of silver, a fact worth noting on its own account.

However, for ordinary business purposes the main test for fineness was appearance, for it is not so difficult to tell fineness by appearance as it would seem prima facie. There are several methods of extracting silver from the ore, and each method leaves its own mark on the products; and I found that after a while I could detect the quality of certain classes of silver myself without a reference to assay. Long practice makes dealers adepts in testing silver, worn or unworn, at sight; and I found that most of the old "bazaar" women could do so at once with fair accuracy. But, owing to the introduction, first of King Mindón's coins, and now of the British, this kind of practical knowledge is rapidly disappearing. The art of testing weight by handling is still, however, common among the young and old of both sexes.

Lumps of metal stamped to show fineness, but not weight, were in more or less common use. They were all, so far as I know, of foreign origin—either Chinese, Siamese, or Sinhalese.

The irregular tokens above spoken of were lumps of metal made into certain forms and used as coins, though never intended for that purpose. Anything answers for currency to the petty dealer in an Upper Burma bazaar, provided she knows that it is of true metal and has a value by weight. I have had a copper button and a copper seal (Burmese) tendered to me in all good faith in payment of petty bazaar fees by Burmese women.

In using lumps of metal of indefinite size as currency the practice was, as in China, to chop off the required weight from the lump and to tender the chip in exchange for the article wanted. In out-of-the-way places some dealers still keep a hammer and chisel for the purpose, and others either go to the local jeweller or assayer and get the lump chipped off for them, or borrow his hammer and chisel and do the needful themselves.

If we may define a coin as a lump of metal stamped with recognised marks to indicate fineness and weight—i.e., exchange value—my collection exhibits a complete history of the evolution of coinage:

(1) The mere lump of metal whose fineness can only be tested by actual assay or outward appearance, and its weight only by actual weight.

(2) The lump of metal whose fineness is attested by a mark stamped thereon, but whose weight can only be ascertained by actual weight.

(3) The token whose appearance and apparent weight gives it an exchange value without further test.

(4) The coin stamped by marks to indicate weight and fineness—i.e., exchange value.

(5) Coin of the realm, or coin stamped with those marks which give it a forced currency within the realm and make it the legal medium of exchange.

The raw lump currency of Upper Burma consisted of gold, silver, and lead; but not of copper, so far as I know, as that metal is not, I believe, to be found in the country.

The purest recognised silver is called Shan baw, or pure silver (baw) from the Shan country. It is also known, on account of its appearance, as chaubinbaw baw and Khayūbat ngwē. There is silver known as Burmese baw, and the process of extraction would appear to be the same in both cases. The second quality of silver is called dain, running to about 89 to 93 per cent. of baw. It is known by the marks of striation on its surface. Nguēlōn and Mainyōn-ngwē, the latter a Shan silver, both known by their appearance, are said to be equal to dain in fineness. The third quality is called ywetnī, about 85 per cent. of baw, and is interesting as having been the standard of silver when the Burmese court was at Ava. Thākhwā, of about the same fineness, is used in Bhamo chiefly, and is said to be extracted by the Chinese across the border. It is readily known by its spongy appearance.

I have other specimens of alloyed silver, with local names signifying the amount of alloy contained in the lump. There is a large number of recognised alloyed standards. The Taungwin Mingyi, second minister to the late king, gave me a list of twenty from memory, but the ordinary traders recognise only about eight. These are 97½ per cent., 95 per cent., 92½ per cent., 90 per cent., 87½ per cent., 85 per cent., 83 per cent., and 80 per cent., of baw, which is itself not quite pure silver according to the Calcutta mint standard. My specimens are sengājatkē, a name which means "fifteen rupees alloy" (in Rs. 100 of standard silver). Asēkkē similarly means "one greater alloy." Both these are known by appearance; but a third specimen, lēzegē, meaning "forty (rupees) alloy," I had to have tested by rough assay before an opinion was given.

My raw gold specimens are khayūbatkē, or pure gold, and mājū, i.e., half gold, because it contains 50 per cent. of valueless alloy. I was, however, so fortunate as to procure the set of gold standards or touch needles of a bankrupt jeweller which show ten standards, viz., 96 per cent., 95 per cent., 90 per cent., 85 per cent., 80 per cent., 75 per cent., 70 per cent., 65 per cent., 60 per cent., and 50 per cent. The Burmese reckon all fineness or touch in terms of the rupee (or tickal), and it is interesting to note that English silver is called chaumūgē (6 annas alloy in Rs. 10), or 94 per cent. of baw.

Lead currency, well known in Lower Burma, is simply called khēgē, or lump lead. I have two specimens: one which had been in the possession of an old woman for forty years, and one which has a hammer and chisel attached for cutting up.

Of the lumps stamped for fineness only, I have but one specimen, and that is a piece of Myinkā silver, which is nothing but the well-known "sycee" of former commerce and the old books. It is rare in Burma now, and I only procured my specimen on the last day I was in Mandalay, where I stayed three years. It used to be, however, a standing "product" of Upper Burma, and until twenty years ago, at any rate, the only currency in Bhamo, where our political agents were paid in it. "Sycee" is a bank issue of China, and is stamped with the name and designation of the issuing bank, much in the fashion of a bank note. With it may be compared the "book" money of Persia and Ceylon, specimens of which are still fairly common in Western Indian bazaars.

The irregular tokens alone mentioned are very interesting. First comes chālōn or chaubinbaw, the well-known Shan shell-money. These are on the border-land between real tokens and lumps of metal marked for fineness, as their shape proves the latter. They are not manufactured, but are the result of the natural efflorescence of silver under certain methods of extraction. They are necessarily pure, and weight is tested by handling, so they pass for tokens. In some of my silver specimens efflorescence in this form is to be seen adhering to the silver from which it springs. The chief use of these silver shells was as customary presents from the Shan chiefs to the Burmese King. Like all Shan silver, they contain about 6 per cent. of gold, and in some of the specimens salts of gold are clearly visible on the under surface.

Next come mājizis, or tamarind seeds, in gold and silver. Burmese children, especially little girls, are very fond of a game which consists in throwing a tamarind seed into the air with one hand and seeing how many more can be picked up by the same hand before it falls and is caught. The royal children used those made of gold and silver, and King Mindón used significantly to impress upon the little princesses the importance of keeping those that he gave them against a rainy day. They have now been mostly sold or melted down, and are already exceedingly rare. They are tokens, owing to their weight and fineness being assumed; and when, as subsequently happened, the mājizis assumed a uniform and conventional shape, size, and fineness, we are brought to a point very near the true coin.

Tan-thōng, or Shan mājizis, used as customary gifts like the chālōn, are still nearer the true coin, as they are conventionally stamped. I suspect, however, that the influence of the Siamese tickal is to be seen here.

I have already alluded to the fact that a copper button and a copper Burmese seal were tendered to me as currency, because both answered roughly to a piece of British currency. These were looked on as true tokens; but I have a third specimen in the shape of a British quarter-anna of 1887 with the obverse filed smooth. It was tendered as a pice in payment of a ferry fee. Here there may have been swindling on the part of the person who filed the coin, but the bona fides of the old woman who tendered it was never questioned. In her eyes it was currency because it was copper and weighed a pice or thereabouts.

Although the coin stamped to indicate weight and fineness comes before the regular coin of the realm, in the order of evolution, it will be more convenient to treat the Burmese specimens in the reverse order, because the former were imitations of the latter. This I will do in my next letter.

EARLY IRISH ART.

Bardwell Rectory, Bury St. Edmunds :
October 2, 1890.

The following letter, just received by me from Miss Stokes, is, I am sure, worthy of publication in the columns of the ACADEMY.

F. E. WARREN.

"Carrig Breac, Howth: September 23, 1890.

"DEAR MR. WARREN,—

"I read your note in the ACADEMY [September 20, p. 253] with much interest, and should have written at once to you on the subject, but that I had no copy of the 'Handbook' referred to in the house until to-day. But I am sorry to say that I cannot agree with your theory of the meaning of this design any more than I now agree with my own hasty suggestion that it 'may be held to signify a flower.'

"I now believe it is intended for a star—but a star in the heart of which burns the monogram of Christ xpi, the ι being horizontal. Another variety omits the horizontal ι.

"I found this sign at Bobio in the Apennines on the tomb of Bishop Cummian, A.D. 740; and looking into Le Blant's Gaulish Inscriptions, I find it constantly on Christian tombstones of the fourth and fifth centuries. It is called by Remondini and by Le Blant 'the monogram of Christ in form of a wheel.'"

"This star is sculptured on several sarcophagi in Provence, on which the Nativity is represented appearing above the figure of the Virgin. It affects the wheel form, that is, the six or eight rays being enclosed in a circle; but it varies from other stars found in other scenes than the Nativity, the distinctive mark being the perpendicular central line. This variety, as Le Blant tells us (Inscriptions Chrétiennes de la Gaule, vol. 1., p. 27), is explained by a fresco painting of the Nativity of the Saviour in the cemetery of St. Cyriacus at Rome. Here one of the Magi raising his finger to heaven points to the Chi-Rho monogram as it were taking the place of a star. The wheel on the sarcophagi represents the cypher of the Saviour, 'the morning star' of the Book of Revelation (xxii. 16). I may add that, unless my memory deceives me, this initial N in the Book of Kells belongs to the text, 'Nativitas Christi.'"

"I remain,
"Yours truly,
"MARGARET STOKES."

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE new volume of the Magazine of Art, which commences with the November number, will be printed with new type on new paper. Two series of articles are promised: "Great Picturesque and Historical Houses of England," beginning with Warwick Castle, illustrated by Mr. John Fulleylove; and "Collections of Modern Pictures in England," beginning with that of Lord Armstrong. Mr. Spielmann, the editor, will himself write on the portraits of Mr. Ruskin; and Mr. Theodore Watts on the portraits of Tennyson. Among other features in the programme for the coming year are—"Illuminated MSS.," by Mr. William Morris; "Drawing," by Mr. Holman Hunt; "Miniature Painting in England," by Dr. Lumsden Propert; and "Book Illustration," by Mr. William Black and Mr. Harry Furniss. The frontispiece to the November number will be an etching by Mr. James Dobie, after Mr. G. F. Watts's "Fata Morgana."

MR. GEORGE GLAZEBROOK, of Oak Hill Park, Liverpool, has just issued, in a limited edition for private circulation, a little volume that will have interest for students of heraldry, and especially for those attracted by the artistic aspects of heraldry as a branch of decorative art. The book is entitled The Dates of Various Shaped Shields, with Coincident Dates and Examples; and it may be regarded as a careful and successful "attempt to classify and date the various shapes found in heraldic shields, principally in England." Among the numerous illustrations the student will find a good deal that is new and curious.

MR. GLAZEBROOK also contemplates the publication of a more extensive heraldic work, a Corpus Sigillorum, to bring together in one view a large number of English seals, averaging fifty selected and characteristic examples in each century from the eleventh to the seventeenth, arranged in order of date, which would illustrate, in one view, the progress of the art of seal-engraving in our country. Mr. Glazebrook has already formed, for his own use, the collection of examples from which the illustrations of his proposed book would be taken; and when a sufficient number of subscribers have sent in their names the work will be proceeded with. Such a book would be an interesting and valuable one; yet we cannot but hope that within a measurable period a still more comprehensive work on the same subject may be undertaken, one that would do for the seals of England what the two volumes of the late Henry Laing did so excellently for those of the sister country.

WE greatly regret to notice the death of that veteran collector and eminent art student and art patron, Mr. James Anderson Rose. Mr. Anderson Rose, a solicitor by profession—and solicitor to the Standard newspaper—was one of the few men who, as collectors, have the initiative and the courage to think for themselves. He began to collect a great many years ago. He was one of the first people to see merit in the drawings of F. Sandys and in the etchings and drypoints of Whistler. Sandys, we believe, made a very remarkable portrait of the mother of Mr. Anderson Rose, a lady of singular dignity of mien and presence; while of Mr. Whistler's etchings—of those fine ones especially which were executed now between thirty and forty years ago—Mr. Anderson Rose formed a collection which was perhaps quite the most notable of its period. Of the noble etchings of Méryon—now admitted to be classic—Mr. Anderson Rose possessed a few examples; but in the bulk of his collection, representative of contemporary and past engraving, these were indeed but as a drop in the bucket. For when, about a dozen years ago, Mr. Anderson Rose decided de se défaire of the greater portion of his prints, it was found that it would take Messrs. Sotheby something like a fortnight's steady selling to dispose of them. They passed under the hammer; but no sooner had they been dispersed than Mr. Rose—with the true instinct of a collector—began to accumulate once more. How much he leaves behind him is at the present moment difficult to say; but it is certain that his house, on Wandsworth Common, was crowded with pictures, prints, drawings, and books. Books even blocked the staircase. None could be kinder, more generous, or more encouraging to the young artist than Mr. Anderson Rose. Associated to some extent in his early days with the English Pre-Raphaelites, he was—as even his interest in one or two of the names that we have mentioned will have convinced the reader—much too broad and independent to be identified with any sect.

THE STAGE.

THE CONSERVATOIRE AND THE FRANÇAIS.

MR. FREDERICK WEDMORE—who has now, however, returned from the continent—writes to us from Paris:—"What one must speak of frankly as the absolute failure of young Mdlle. Moreno at the first of her débûts at the Théâtre Français brings up again a subject of interest and importance—that of the relations existing between the Conservatoire and the leading subsidised theatre. To Mdlle. Moreno there had fallen at the Conservatoire the unusual good fortune of having been chosen as the recipient of the very highest prizes, alike in tragedy and in comedy; and that the choice was ill-deserved no one has asserted. To receive either of these two distinctions—as the rule at present is—would have been enough to open the doors of the Théâtre Français to the student so honoured. The receipt of both of them, while it could hardly make more certain the appearance of the actress at the first national theatre, did naturally increase the expectation of the public; and a first night that had been timed elsewhere for the same date was actually put off in order that as much of "tout Paris" as can be got together at the end of September might assist, with uninterrupted thought, at Mdlle. Moreno's débût. On such an occasion the actress is free to select her own part, and Mdlle. Moreno's choice fell upon the part of the Queen in Hugo's "Ruy Blas."

On the eventful night a singularly patient audience waited through act after act for effects that did not come, and for the display of a talent of which there was hardly a trace. The actress was nervous—that may be taken for granted. But that was not all. The quality of her voice, the nature of her figure and facial expression, her obvious incapacity for that abandonment which, in one of its episodes, the rôle demands—all these gradually convinced the company, from gallery to orchestra, that Mdlle. Moreno had chosen her character with very little judgment. The young lady was forgiven, in virtue of the genuineness of her effort, and in virtue, too, of her past at the Conservatoire; and the second débût—for which a comedy part will, of course, be chosen—was looked forward to charitably, or, perhaps, even with hopefulness. For the lady is intelligent, has a measure of piquancy and incisiveness; and it is utterly impossible that her honours at the Conservatoire can have been bestowed upon her for nothing. I am concerned with her, however, very little for her own sake. I regard her as a text from which it is desirable to hold forth, in exposition of the fact that every arrangement of the Théâtre Français is not quite so perfect as the superior person in England invariably assumes that it is. For the case of Mdlle. Moreno is only an extreme one. Over and over again the same thing happens in a modified form—student and public suffer together, owing to the unripe though promising student having been pitchforked suddenly from a first-rate school on to the boards and into the company of the first, and the most learned, and the most accomplished theatre of the day. There is, of course, a natural curiosity to see the young men and women to whom, at a national training institution, the highest honours have fallen; but the Français is able, after all, to dispense with this element of attractiveness. It could leave the winners of first prizes to the Odéon, which already gets the services of the winners of the second. Nor would such a change tell at all in the long run against the chances of the younger performers. It would rather be the other way. The company at the Odéon is essentially moveable; that at the Français is more or less permanent. As it is even now, the winner of the second prize is not seldom more fortunately placed at the second theatre. There fewer people are in front of him, or of her; and the débût once over, with its exceptional and not-to-be-repeated opportunities for the choice of parts, the beginner does not find himself continually crowded out of everything that has the least promise in it, through the circumstance that everything is claimed by a more established artist in a similar emploi. At the Français, when even a successful débût is once over, the young player is terribly apt to be kept idle and invisible for months or years, or, if visible, to be visible only while a door opens and a letter is handed in. The interests of art would seem, I think, to demand that the first connexion between the Conservatoire and the Français shall be less close and immediate, only that some later one shall be more prolonged and more fruitful."

THE LABOUR MOVEMENT in AMERICA. By

RICHARD T. ELY, Ph.D., Associate in Political Economy, Johns Hopkins University. Crown 8vo, 5s. [Ready.]

MANCHESTER EXAMINER AND TIMES.—"It may be said without hesitation, that it is the most complete history of the labour movements in the United States which has appeared, and that it will be read with very considerable interest by all who are concerned in industrial questions in this country."

SATURDAY REVIEW.—"Both interesting and valuable."

GIRLS and WOMEN. By E. Chester. A Book

for Girls. Thoroughly readable, wise, and judicious. 1 vol., crown 8vo. [In the press.]

THE GENTLE ART of MAKING ENEMIES.

As Pleasingly Exemplified in many Instances, wherein the Serious Ones of this Earth, Carefully Exasperated, have been Prettily Spurred on to Indiscretion and Unseemliness, while Overcome by an Undue Sense of Right. By J. McNEIL WHISTLER. In 1 vol., pott 4to, 10s. 6d. [Ready.]

PUNCH, June 21.—"The book in itself, in its binding, print, and arrangement, is a work of art."

COME FORTH! By Elizabeth Stuart Phelps,

and HERBERT D. WARD, Authors of "The Master of the Magicians." 1 vol., imperial 16mo, cloth gilt, 7s. 6d.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"Mr. and Mrs. Ward have produced a fifth Gospel.....We have no hesitation in prophesying a wide popularity for this Gospel."

SCOTSMAN.—"Come Forth! is the story of the raising of Lazarus, amplified into a romantic love story.....A vivid conception of the historical nature of the Scriptural characters, an adequate knowledge of the archaeology of the subject, and a reverence for the theme are all unobtrusively present in the book, which, for the rest, has a high imaginative power. So far from being dull or obviously didactic, the story has a simple, forthright dramatic interest, such as is seldom attained."

THE MASTER of the MAGICIANS. By

ELIZABETH STUART PHELPS and HERBERT D. WARD. In 1 vol., imperial 16mo, 7s. 6d.

ATHENAEUM.—"The Court of Babylon, under Nebuchadnezzar, has provided ample material for a thrilling story. There is an admirable description of a lion hunt, and other incidents worthy of Mr. Rider Haggard; but the human interest grows with the story, and it is with regret that the reader takes leave of Daniel.....The Hebrew prince and prophet is here represented in his youth as full of personal attractions, of great courage and physical dexterity. The purity of his life, and the stoicism of his concealed love, only heightened by the pathetically human touch of the last scene, are sufficient reminders that it is the man of God who walks alone and upright through the dissolute Court of Babylon."

THE BONDMAN: a New Saga. By Hall Caine.

Popular Edition. In 1 vol., cloth, 3s. 6d.

MR. GLADSTONE says: "'The Bondman' is a work of which I recognise the freshness, vigour, and sustained interest no less than its integrity of aim."

IN the VALLEY: a Novel. By Harold Frederic.

In 3 vols. Illustrated.

THE MOMENT AFTER: a Tale of the Unseen.

By ROBERT BUCHANAN. Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d.

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.—"Great power and vigorous English."

ATHENAEUM.—"Should be read—in daylight."

OBSERVER.—"A clever tour de force."

A MARKED MAN: Some Episodes in his Life.

By ADA CAMBRIDGE. 3 vols.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"A most powerful and thrilling novel.....ought to be a great success."

SPEAKER.—"Among the works of fiction which have appeared this year 'A Marked Man' stands very high."

THE DOMINANT SEVENTH: a Musical Story.

By KATE ELIZABETH CLARK. Crown 8vo, 5s.

OBSERVER.—"Original, and displays an amount of cultivation considerably above the average."

HEINEMANN'S INTERNATIONAL LIBRARY.

Edited by EDMUND GOSSE.

Each volume 2s. 6d. in paper; 3s. 6d. in cloth.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE. By Emil Franzos, Author

of "For the Right."

PIERRE and JEAN. By Guy de Maupassant.

"So far as my judgment goes, a faultless production."—HENRY JAMES.

ATHENAEUM.—"Ranks amongst the best gems of modern French fiction."

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"So fine and faultless, so perfectly balanced, so steadily progressive, so clear, and simple, and satisfying. It is admirable from beginning to end."

SUNDAY TIMES.—"Delightfully fresh and breezy in tone, and as pure as heart could wish."

IN GOD'S WAY. By Bjornstjerne Bjornson.

ACADEMY.—"The most masterly work by the famous Norwegian novelist."

SATURDAY REVIEW.—"The English reader could desire no better introduction to contemporary foreign fiction than this notable novel."

W. H. SMITH & SON'S
SUBSCRIPTION LIBRARY,
186, STRAND, LONDON, and at the Railway Bookstalls.

1.—This Library is established in connexion with Messrs. W. H. SMITH & Son's numerous Railway Bookstalls; it embraces all the most important Works of History, Biography, Travel, Fiction, Poetry, Science, and Theology, as well as the leading Magazines and Reviews, and gives greater advantages to Subscribers than any other existing Library, from the fact that there are 500 Bookstalls in England and Wales, and to any of these Depots a Subscriber may be transferred free of charge.

2.—Subscribers can only change their Books at the Depot where their names are registered, but they may transfer the place of exchange by giving notice to the Clerk in charge of the Depot at which they obtain their Books. Of the current periodicals, one only at a time is allowed to a Subscription under Five Guineas, and Subscriptions will not be accepted for the supply of Magazines and Reviews only.

A Catalogue of Surplus and New Books, offered at greatly reduced prices, is published Monthly, and can be had upon application at the Bookstalls. Also a Catalogue of Books in elegant bindings, for Gentlemen's Libraries.

LITERATURE.

Bacon's Essays. Edited, with introduction and illustrative notes, by Samuel Harvey Reynolds. (Oxford: Clarendon Press.)

For ordinary purposes there is no edition of Bacon's Essays comparable with Mr. Aldis Wright's; and it is sufficient praise of Mr. Reynolds's book to say that it does not fall below that standard. Perhaps, considering the size and scale of this edition, we might have expected more than we find; certainly Mr. Reynolds will not supersede Mr. Wright.

Yet this new edition has great merits of its own, and an independent treatment which fully justify its appearance. The notes, in the main, are not philological, but explanatory; indeed, Mr. Reynolds confesses, or boasts, that "he has no taste" for grammatical and philological disquisitions. The edition is for the common reader, who will find collected a valuable mass of parallel passages from contemporary writers, and discussions of obscure or antiquarian points. In the notes, however, Mr. Reynolds is fond of explaining too much and too little. No reader can require to be told that "to keep an indifferent carriage" means "to maintain an impartial bearing"; while many readers may look in vain for an explanation of the word "aculeate." Mr. Reynolds disagrees with Mr. Wright where he says that "the English reader will find few difficulties in Bacon's language and style." Every page, asserts Mr. Reynolds, "bristles with difficulties." Certainly Mr. Wright's opinion has the greater sanction: it is wholly a new opinion that Bacon's style is obscure. Mr. Reynolds gives instances of obscurity. He tells us that in a certain passage "no one would discover without assistance" that "less partially" means "with less of party spirit." Surely the reader who required assistance here were unfit to read Bacon. Again, Mr. Reynolds says that the meaning of "adamant," in the sense of "loadstone," "would be missed by those who understood 'adamant' in the only modern sense of the word." But such a reader would be ignorant of Shakspeare: "You draw me yet, hard-hearted adamant!" And Bacon is censured for the use of antiquated words, or of words coined by himself. But no one could in this matter compare Bacon with Spenser, "who," said Ben Jonson, "in affecting the Ancients writ no Language." Rather, Bacon follows the precepts of Horace, or of Ben Jonson himself, where he writes:

"Words borrow'd of Antiquity do lend a kind of Majesty to stile, and are not without their delight sometimes. For they have the Authority of years, and out of their intermission do win to themselves a kind of gracelike newness."

Again:

"Some words are to be cull'd out for ornament and colour, as we gather Flowers to strew Houses, or make Garlands; but they are better when they grow to our stile; as in a Meadow, where though the mere grass and greenness delight, yet the variety of Flowers doth heighten and beautifie."

This may remind us of Mr. Pater's saying, that "prose is found to be a coloured thing with Bacon." In truth, Bacon's style is curious, careful, elaborate; full of concision, of economy, of mind. But he is, of all the Elizabethans, the least easy to misunderstand for readers conversant with that age. He has no lengthy involutions, where grammar loses itself; no awkward inability to have done with his sentence, or with his subject. De Quincey said of him that he is "figurative and sensuous, as great thinkers must always be": a most exact and beautiful description. Voltaire also, who found Shakspeare so obscurely barbarous, calls Bacon an "écrivain élégant"; Newman, who disliked his philosophy, praises "his most majestic gravity of phrase"; Coleridge says that his language is "dignified but plain, genuine English, although elevated and brightened by superiority of intellect in the writer." Pope expressly commends the introduction, by good writers, of old words, and, curiously enough in this connexion names Bacon as a treasury of fine phrases. Good writers will "Command old words that long have slept to wake, Words that wise Bacon or brave Rawleigh spake."

There is in Bacon's writing a spirit of majesty, a kind of sacred unction and eloquence, such as are seen in him alone. He writes with a divine superiority to others, a perfect pleasure and satisfaction in his work. Each word bears its full meaning; each sentence is necessary to the argument; each essay is like a grave and reverend oracle. This profound way of writing is, indeed, not obvious, nor trivial; but it cannot be considered difficult. Addison has said the last word in this matter:

"Bacon had the sound, distinct, comprehensive knowledge of Aristotle, with all the beautiful Lights, Graces, and Embellishments of Cicero. One does not know which to admire most in his writings, the strength of Reason, force of Style, or brightness of Imagination."

It is probably with a view to assist the modern reader that Mr. Reynolds has modernised the spelling of Bacon: as well might we alter the music of Mozart for modern players as change the spelling of a classic. "To modernise the spelling of a classic," pleads Mark Pattison, "is nothing less than to deface one of the monuments of the language."

There are a few points upon which we are constrained to differ from Mr. Reynolds, especially in the matter of Bacon's quotations. He accuses Bacon of "grave distortion," and he gives instances. "Jesting Pilate" is attacked, because "Whately gives what seem good reasons for believing that Pilate was not jesting." The Lord Chancellor had as good a right to his opinion as the Archbishop in a matter incapable of decision; and Charlotte Brontë, in her poem upon Pilate's wife, takes his view. Again, the passage in the Fathers, which, according to Bacon, "calls poesy vinum daemonum," cannot be found; but Mr. Wright gives two passages, from Jerome and Augustine, which say the same thing in other words. Clearly, Bacon did not invent the quotation. Again, Bacon writes: "It is foretold that, when Christ cometh, He shall not find faith upon the earth." To this Mr. Reynolds objects, that Christ only asked a question, without stating a fact. But the form of the question implies a negative answer: as Beza held, when he translated the words by, Num reperturus est? and the Vulgate gives Verumtamen Filius hominis rediens, putas, inveniet; which to a nice ear is not an open question, but a delicate negative. Once more, Bacon writes, in his "Essay of Beauty":

"If it be true, that the Principall Part of Beauty, is in Decent Motion, certainly it is no marvaile, though Persons in yeares, seeme many times more Amiable; Pulchrorum Autumnus pulcher."

Mr. Reynolds is of opinion that the omission of etiam is a culpable garbling of the quotation. I cannot see that it makes any difference to Bacon's purpose; nor did Donne, if he was thinking of the same quotation, when he wrote of Herbert's mother:

"Nor Spring, nor Summer's beauty, hath such grace,
As I have seen in one Autumnal face."

Mr. Reynolds states that the French versions of the Essays, by Baudoin, were "little known, and little worth knowing"; Bayle, however, says that they were in great estimation, and frequently reprinted. More might have been said in the notes upon the subject of gardens, of building, and of masques. It would have been profitable to compare Sir Henry Wotton's Treatise on Architecture, or of later date, Evelyn's works, with Bacon's treatment of such matters. Evelyn, in his Sculptura, couples the names of Bacon and Wotton:

"Pliny records of his age, that there were almost as many statues as men, by a kind of noble contention, says Sir H. Wotton, in point of fertility betwixt Art and Nature, and which he and my Lord Bacon improve to a politic, as well as altogether an expenceful magnificency."

But there are many features in Mr. Reynolds's notes most valuable and welcome. Such are his dissertations upon Baconian theories of political economy, usury, commerce, plantations; upon points of law and of judicial procedure; upon the politics and history of the day. In truth, this edition is rather for the historian than for the man of letters. Everything that lies outside the immediate province of literature, Mr. Reynolds has excellently treated. It is in the more purely aesthetic, or artistic, criticism, that he is not wholly successful. Upon Mr. Reynolds's view of Bacon's character, we are heartily at one with him. He agrees neither with Blake, who tells us that "The Prince of Darkness is a Lord Chancellor," and that "King James was Bacon's primum mobile"; nor with Spedding, "whose view of Bacon's virtue," writes Fitzgerald, "is so rarefied that the common consciences of men cannot endure it." Elsewhere Fitzgerald described Spedding "washing his Blackamoor"; in fact, Spedding appears to have held with George Herbert, who addresses Bacon as Collega Solis. Admiration of Bacon is as traditional in England as admiration of Shakspeare; ever since his own time, a chorus of praise has ascended. "He is," says Walton, borrowing the phrase from Wotton, "the great Secretary of Nature and of all learning." "He is," cries Pope, taking the phrase from Addison, "the greatest genius that England, or perhaps any country, ever produced." Chapman extols "your Lordship's truly Greek inspiration and absolutely Attic elocution." Peacham, author of the Compleat Gentleman, speaks of "the Essayes and other peeces of the excellent Master of eloquence, my lord of S. Albanes, who possesseth not only eloquence, but all good learning, as hereditarie both by Father and Mother." Ben Jonson writes of him in so high a strain, in verse and prose, that Mr. Donnelly finds the panegyric applicable only to Shakspeare, who was therefore Bacon. Burke, speaking in Parliament, exclaims:

"We recognise in Bacon everything of genius the most profound, everything of literature the most extensive, everything of discovery the most penetrating, everything of observation upon human life the most distinguishing and refined."

Voltaire, whether in praise or blame is dubious, says of the Essays that

"n'étant ni la Satire de la nature humaine, comme les maximes de la Rochefoucault, ni l'école du Scepticisme, comme Montagne, ils sont moins lus que ces deux livres ingénieux."

Landor, in his most paradoxical humour, maintains that "the little volume of Bacon's Essays exhibits not only more strength of mind, not only more true philosophy, but more originality, more fancy, more imagination, than all the volumes of Plato." Thomson, in the Seasons, chaunts his praises:

"him for the shade
Kind nature form'd, deep, comprehensive, clear,
Exact and elegant, in one rich soul
Plato, the Stagyrte, and Tully join'd."

After this extreme, it is salutary to return to the other: to Blake's criticisms. "Good advice for Satan's kingdom," he writes upon the title-page of the Essays. Bacon is "fool, liar, villain, atheist, Satan, stupid." And he corrects his political economy with great justice and wisdom. Bacon writes, "The increase of any state must be upon the foreigner." Blake replies, "The increase of a state, as of a man, is from internal improvement, or intellectual acquirement. Man is not improved by the hurt of another. States are not improved at the expense of foreigners."

But extremes are foolish. Mr. Reynolds has well preserved the just mean; and he has put forth an edition of these celebrated Essays, not indeed perfect and final, yet worthy of the Oxford University Press, whence it appears.

LIONEL JOHNSON.

A Visit to Chile and the Nitrate Fields of Tarapacá. By William Howard Russell. With Illustrations by Mr. Melton Prior. (Virtue.)

To a mere accident the public are indebted for this delightful volume from the still bright and graphic pen of the veteran Times Crimean correspondent. All preparations had actually been completed by Dr. Russell for spending the spring of 1889 in Egypt; places had even been retained for himself and wife in the Peninsular and Oriental Mirzapore; and apartments engaged at Sheppard's Hotel, Cairo, when a casual meeting with the "Nitrate King," Col. North, caused a sudden volte face from east to west. It cannot be doubted that we are all gainers by the change. Had the first project been carried out, the author would have either lacked the courage to add another to the countless books on the Nile Valley, or having made the venture could have scarcely hoped to produce such a fresh and instructive volume as this lively account of the comparatively novel region of Chile and its nitrate fields. To Dr. Russell himself the objection naturally occurred that he knew next to nothing of these things. But the objection was shrewdly overruled by the "Cecil Rhodes of South America," who had naturally seized such a favourable opportunity of procuring an absolutely unbiassed account of the extensive operations now being carried on by him in the Tarapacá nitrate districts. These speculations had been freely spoken of as shams, if not "swindles," and malicious tongues could best be silenced by a truthful statement of facts from an unprofessional observer otherwise above suspicion. "So much the better!" he therefore replied, adding that all the traveller would have to do would be to judge for himself and relate what he saw.

This roving commission, as it may be called, though honourable alike to all concerned, has been executed by Dr. Russell with rare tact and judgment, and the results of his observations on the spot are here placed before the reader in the lucid manner we should expect from a recognised master of descriptive language. His report is all the more welcome that, despite their great economic value and scientific interest, there exists no trustworthy popular account of the rich deposits of raw nitrate of soda spread over a large extent of the rainless zone on the South American seaboard, and not known to occur in any other part of the world. These deposits, now mainly worked by British enterprise, are invariably found at an altitude ranging from 2500 to 3500 feet above the sea-level, at from ten to ninety miles from the coast, and almost exclusively between 19° and 27° south latitude, but increasing in richness northwards. Thus the percentage in the caliche, or nitrate rock, rises from 33 in the Atacama desert to 40 and even 50 in the Tarapacá district, wrested by Chile from Peru during the late war. The fields, which cover hundreds of square miles, contain many million tons of this valuable fertiliser; and the trade has already acquired such a development that Col. North alone pays no less than £350,000 per annum on the nitrate prepared and exported from his works in Tarapacá.

Dr. Russell deals at some length with the much discussed question of the origin of the nitrates, sulphates, boracic acid compounds, and many other associated substances, such as common salt, chloride of calcium, gypsum, iodides, bromides, and carbonates. Though unprepared with any better theory, he is unable, like many others, to accept without reservation the commonly received "lagoon hypothesis," according to which the deposits were originally formed in marine inlets changed by upheaval into land-locked basins. Here the water would be gradually evaporated, leaving at first a deposit of pure sea-salt, which in the absence of any rainfall would remain unliquified and exposed for ages to chemical reactions of all kinds. There is certainly abundant evidence of upheaval along this seaboard to a height of at least 1200 or 1400 feet. But there would also appear to be equally abundant evidence of a former rainfall sufficient to support a more or less numerous population in these now uninhabited districts, and consequently also to liquify the deposits of sea-salt in the shallow depressions. Maize cobs, stone axes, arrow-heads, and even highly tempered copper knives and fragments of textiles have been brought to light in many parts of these arid plains, where no trace of water can be anywhere found for leagues round about.

This is accepted as proof of a change in the climate, and no attempt has been made by the advocates of the lagoon theory to meet the difficulty. But the lagoon theory is probably sound; and the difficulty may perhaps be met by reference to the social condition of the Peruvian empire, of which all these coastlands formed part. In all the lands under the sway of the Incas the art of irrigation had been so highly developed that many since uninhabitable districts were thickly peopled in pre-Columbian times. Such, for instance, was the Ancón Coast at the northern extremity of the rainless zone, where the burial-grounds have yielded such rich archaeological treasures to Weiss and Stübel and other explorers. We know also that the Atacama desert itself was partly occupied by a few Indian groups said to have been related to the Bolivian Aymaras, and some of these Atacameños appear still to survive near the Punta Negra Salina at the west foot of the Llullayaca volcano. The copper knives and pieces of cloth found in Tarapacá imply a relatively high state of culture, and point therefore rather to the evidence of irrigation works than to a change of climate, which is in itself to the last degree improbable, and of which there is nowhere any direct evidence in the presence of dried-up water-courses, recent vegetable and animal remains, and the like.

But the work deals with many other interesting topics besides the nitrate fields. On the outward voyage St. Vincent, Rio, Tierra del Fuego, Coronel, Valparaiso, and Iquique were touched at, and excursions were made to Santiago and other places in the interior of Chile. Ample scope is here given for the author's powers of observation, and especially the curiosa felicitas with which he hits off just the gist of the argument, and with one or two touches brings out the salient features of the land and its people. At Rio there was trouble over a circular note, which the bankers after much palavering duly honoured—but in Brazilian notes, because “our gold clerk has gone out with the key, and won’t be back till 4 o’clock.” Again, at Punta Arenas, Magellan Strait, the post-office master, “an official of routine and of staid habits of business,” refuses to open the bags because of the late hour, whereupon a mass meeting of “citizens” resolves to storm the place, when he capitulates. “The traditions of the town favour overt acts and voies de fait.”

In the passage through the western part of the Strait, where all the fine scenery lies, the travellers were specially favoured with clear weather—a rare phenomenon in that land of fog and mist. Needless to say that the opportunity is not lost of describing in glowing language “that glorious panorama of forest mountain and glacier, of primeval forest clothing the sides of lake-like inlets up to the verge of the eternal snow-fields, which has no rival in the world.” Here follow the usual visits of half-naked Fuegians in open boats, bartering furs or berries for “bacca, bacca”; and we learn that, since sheep-farming has been introduced, there is more chance of their being exterminated than evangelised. It appears that the sheep-farmers, like the early settlers in Tasmania, have taken to shooting the natives to prevent them stealing the sheep. “They have more to fear from civilisation, as it is presented to them, than from their cruel natural foes—cold and starvation.”

Like all recent observers, Dr. Russell notices the rapid progress of Chile in moral and material well-being—its commercial development, improved agricultural and mining processes, spread of education, and especially its orderly government, in such striking contrast to other Hispano-American commonwealths. The picture drawn of unhappy Peru is correspondingly gloomy—bankrupt, despondent, with no hope except in everlasting revolutions or a strong protectorate, now desired by many of its best citizens.

A word of praise is due to Mr. Melton Prior’s numerous illustrations, which are mostly worthy of the text they so admirably interpret.

Capital and Interest: a Critical History of Economical Theory. By Prof. Engen von Böhm-Bawerk. Translated, with a Preface and Analysis, by Prof. William Smart. (Macmillan.)

THE work which Prof. Smart has excellently translated forms the Introduction to the Positive Theory of Capital, which was reviewed in the ACADEMY of May 4, 1889. It will be remembered that we signalled, as Prof. Böhm-Bawerk’s principal contribution to economic theory, his philosophical analysis of bargains relating to future goods. Is this theory as new as it is important? The “critical history” which is now before us supplies an affirmative answer to this question. Prof. Böhm-Bawerk’s vast learning forms a complete register of all the ideas which have been as it were patented by his predecessors. Among the immense number of specifications there nowhere occurs the particular construction which he claims as his own. The ideas which he has put together no doubt existed separately before. That future pleasures count for less than present, ceteris paribus, had been observed by many philosophers from Plato to Jevons; but no one, or hardly any one, seems to have systematically applied this conception to the explanation of interest. Thus Prof. Böhm-Bawerk is, not indeed a creator of ideas, but a maker; which is all that can be said of the highest originality. The theory of interest, which he is one of the first to have clearly formulated, may be compared with the theory of final utility, which he has aptly restated, as being each of them a corner stone rejected by the builders of economic systems, and not until the present generation placed in its proper position. Probably the writer of the last generation who was most nearly right in his treatment of the two principles was Senior.

While attributing great importance to Prof. Böhm-Bawerk’s “positive theory” of interest, we express ourselves with more reserve as to what may be called his negative theory concerning the deficiencies of his predecessors. We are disposed to think that his condemnation of former theories is too sweeping. He draws up a sort of list of the proscribed under several heads: the colourless theory, the fructification theory, the labour theory, and so forth. Some of these we at once give up. The labour theory, that profits are the remuneration of labour—in the case forsooth of wine acquiring value by being kept—is perhaps chiefly useful as a warning against the slips to which even the most powerful intellects are liable in economical reasoning. The exploitation theory which Socialist passion has built on economical error is still less defensible. As to the use theory, we may adopt the cautious language of Prof. Smart’s Preface: “I confess I find some difficulty in stating the economic argument of what our author has called the ‘use theory of interest.’” But are the productivity and the abstinence theories—one or both of which may be attributed to many eminent English writers—so absurd? Is J. S. Mill’s theory a “combination of opposed opinions”? Is it “such a tangle,” and does it form a “very unsuccessful part of his work”? Is Senior guilty of a “logical blunder,” and are we to say of his theory of abstinence: “Plausible as this argument is, its basis is none the less fallacious”?

Let us take as a test case that of Senior. Prof. Böhm-Bawerk thus argues:

“Take the case of a man living in the country who is considering in what kind of labour he should employ his day. . . . He could fish, or shoot, or gather fruit. . . . or he might plant fruit trees from which he could have no return for ten years. . . . What has he sacrificed to obtain the fruit trees? To me there seems no doubt about the answer. He has sacrificed a day’s work, and nothing more. . . . Or, if the indirect way of computation be preferred, instead of the day’s work he may calculate the other kinds of gratification that might have been got by spending the day in other ways—say, the immediate enjoyment of three fish, or of three hares, or of a basket of fruit.”

But it is not allowable to reckon the sacrifice twice by using both these estimates. A “double calculation” of this kind is attributed to Senior in a passage too long to quote. Still, feeling that “Senior’s way of putting the matter has something very fascinating and persuasive about it,” our author returns to the charge. Imagine the following case:—

“I work for a whole day at the planting of fruit trees in the expectation that they will bear fruit for me in ten years. In the night following comes a storm, and entirely destroys the whole plantation. How great is the sacrifice which I have made, as it happens, in vain? I think every one will say—a lost day of work, and nothing more. And now I put the question, Is my sacrifice in any way greater, that the storm does not come, and that the trees without further exertion on my part, bear fruit in ten years? If I do a day’s work and have to wait ten years to get a return from it, do I sacrifice more than if I do a day’s work and by reason of the destructive storm must wait to all eternity for its return? It is impossible to make such an assertion. And yet Senior would have it so.”

We are not convinced by this dialectic. It still appears to us that “Senior’s way of putting the matter has something very fascinating and persuasive about it.” Prof. Böhm-Bawerk’s theory appears to us to be right, and Senior’s not to be wrong.

Our difficulty is not removed if we turn to the translator’s Preface, which is as faithful a representation of the author’s principles as the translation is of his words. First, as to the productivity theory—

“A poor widow owns a chest of tools valued at £50. An unemployed carpenter borrows them. The fifty shillings interest he pays seems almost an inadequate return for the added productiveness given to his labour over the year. Is not the interest made possible by the qualities of the tools? The facts here are as stated: without production there would be no interest. So without land there would be no turnips, but the existence of land is scarcely the sufficient cause of the turnips.”

The land appears to us to be a very important part of the cause. But, of course, we admit that in a more complete statement of the conditions of the phenomenon the difference between the value of present and future goods must be included. But is it not included, virtually at least, if not explicitly, by Senior? Prof. Smart may be regarded as a very able junior counsel who has improved upon the instructions which he has received. But we are not satisfied that he has won the case against the abstinence theory by the following argument and its context:

“An owner of capital embarks it in a productive undertaking. In doing so he decides to undergo the sacrifice of labour (in personally employing his capital), and that labour is made productive and remunerative by the aid of the capital. If, in calculating the remuneration to him, he claims one sum as wage for labour and another as reward for abstaining from the immediate enjoyment of his own wealth, he really makes the double calculation familiarly known as eating one’s cake and having it. The one sacrifice of labour admits of being estimated in two ways: one by the cost to vital force, the other and more common by the greater satisfaction which would have been got from the immediate use of capital as wealth at an earlier time."

In expressing these doubts we should like to imitate the deference which Prof. Bühm-Bawerk himself practises when differing from high authorities—Knies, for instance. We are sensible that an original theory is liable to be misinterpreted just because the conceptions which it introduces are not already possessed by the reader. Cairnes's criticism of Jevons's theory of final utility is a memorable example of the mistakes which may be made in estimating the importance of a new idea. The reviewer of a new work is too often under the disadvantage that he cannot practise "abstinence." He cannot wait for time to exercise its ripening influence upon his judgment. It is possible that a maturer consideration would rank the negative equal with the "positive" theory of capital, which we have already applauded as original and profound.

F. Y. EDGEWORTH.

William Pitt: a Biography. By Edward Walford. (Chatto & Windus.)

THIS volume is a quaint and original fancy. It consists of some three hundred pages, printed in clear and elegant type upon good paper with broad margins and uncut edges; and it is Mr. Walford's birthday present for last year to Mr. Gladstone. A Latin dedication sets out not only the author's veneration for the statesman, but the particular quality in the statesman which has commanded this veneration. Mr. Gladstone, it seems, has proved by his own example "opiniones adolescenti adhibitas multos post annos salvo honore posse mutari"; and to this demonstration Mr. Walford's homage is due and paid. Yet some mystery seems to attend these passages of graceful compliment. Does any stress fall on the opinions of youth or upon change after many years; and would honour be preserved with difficulty, or perhaps lost beyond recall, if the opinions changed were those of maturity and age, or if the change of opinion took place not after many years, but after, say, a general election? Upon these points Mr. Walford ventures no opinion even in the obscurity of a learned language. But a further question remains. This birthday book is a brief Life of William Pitt. Mr. Gladstone is the conspicuous genius of this century, who once was in youth the rising hope of the stern and unbending Tories, and is now in old age the ardent leader of politicians whose principles and policy possess a capacity of indefinite expansion. Why should the present selected for such a man be a Life of the genius of the last century, who began his career full of Liberal promise and capacity for reform, and died the idol of those "top-boot" Tories of whom Mr. Gladstone once was one? The matter is the more singular because Mr. Walford has hardly a single good word to say for one of the principal achievements of Pitt's life, the Act of Union. A barely sympathetic Life of Mr. Gladstone's political antithesis is a curious offering, "venerationis ergo."

And the book is but indifferently executed. The authorities for the life of Pitt are numerous enough. Tomline's, Gifford's, and Stanhope's bulky volumes, with all the crowd of Memoirs, Despatches, and Recollections of that age, oppress the biographer with matter. Macaulay's article in the Encyclopædia Britannica, on the other hand, is an appreciation which even those who dissent from its conclusions cannot hope to surpass in brilliancy. No doubt there is a large intermediate ground. A readable Life of Pitt, which would give all the facts and none of the tittle-tattle, and would fairly criticise without wandering into the region of the might-have-been, is quite possible and would be very welcome. But Mr. Walford has missed the road to this middle space. He could not equal the dulness of Tomline or exceed the prolixity of Stanhope; but, relying on them for his facts, he might at least have painted a portrait full of the life, and told a story lucid, coherent, and complete. Unfortunately, illumination is not the effect which his book produces on the reader's mind. The order of narration is, in the main, chronological, with just sufficient lapses from that method to cause slight bewilderment without exhausting any one branch of the subject. The style is scrappy and casual, and the criticism almost non-existent. It would at least have been possible to have followed the authorities with accuracy and to have corrected the text with exactness. Yet, with Tomline's Life before him, Mr. Walford (p. 23) implies that Mr. Wilson became Pitt's tutor when he matriculated at Cambridge, and not before; whereas, in fact, the young man ceased to be his pupil on going up to the university. He almost goes out of his way to mistake the number of "Fox's Martyrs" at the election of 1784 (p. 80). He mentions the £100,000 offered to Pitt on quitting office in 1801 as being voted by the City of London, when, in fact, it was subscribed by individual London merchants (p. 222). In telling the well-known story about Lord North, Lord George Germaine, and Welbore Ellis, the "Nestor of the Treasury Bench," he ingeniously misquotes Pitt so as to deprive his words of all point and his reference to Homer of all appositeness. Similarly (p. 149), he miscopies a quotation from Macaulay in such a way as to turn a very just reflection into a feeble ineptitude. He draws upon the classics freely; but his comparison of Pitt to one of the characters in Aristotle's Ethics is a comparison that had already occurred to Macaulay; and being minded to make use of the same passage from Virgil ("dis aliter visum") twice in less than seventy pages, he quotes it so that in one case it will not scan, and in the other it is as trite as even this quotation can possibly be made. Mr. Walford would have done well to remember the Duke of Wellington's advice to the nervous member of the House of Commons: "Say what you have to say, don't quote Latin, and sit down." Examples of the inaccuracy of his composition are the statements that "room was found for Mr. Thomas Townshend as a secretaryship of state" (p. 59); and that "a challenge sent by Mr. Tierney next day forced Mr. Pitt to give him satisfaction.

The duel was fought on Putney Heath on Sunday, May 27, 1798. The latter had sent a challenge to the minister in consequence of some angry words in the House of Commons" (p. 195). As an example of Mr. Walford's judgments, it is hardly necessary to do more than quote the following passage (p. 290) from the chapter devoted to the public and private character of Pitt:—

"The name of Pitt has been to some extent immortalised by the Pitt University Press at Cambridge, and by a Pitt Club which has been supposed to keep up the tradition of his opinions . . . His old friend, the Duke of Richmond, was the first president of this club, which for many years celebrated the great statesman's birthday by a triennial dinner, either at the London Tavern or at Merchant Taylors' Hall; and the club still holds two dinners yearly."

Pitt's fame may have been exaggerated in the past, and may be in peril of dwindling in the future; but at least it rests on foundations more secure than the immortality of the Cambridge University Printing Press, of the occasional dinners of an obscure political club, or of the Life of Pitt by Mr. Walford.

It is curious to observe what a change has come over the character of the admiration which Pitt's followers still continue to offer to his memory. The extraordinary suddenness of his rise to greatness is of course always equally striking. Prime Minister at twenty-three, the unquestioned possessor of power till he reached middle life, a combatant able to hold his own single-handed against all the eloquence and experience of the Whig opposition, he has something of the heroic about his figure and career which fascinates the imagination and compels our wonder. He was the Bonaparte of parliamentary warfare. The undergraduate who dashes up to town from Cambridge to eat his dinners at Lincoln's Inn may well be dazzled by the achievement of the young Cambridge bachelor who, just a hundred years ago, passed at a bound from eating mess dinners on the Western Circuit to directing the policy of an empire; who was scarcely emancipated from the control of proctors and tutors before he received the confidence of his sovereign; who dominated debates in which Fox and Burke took part at an age when most barristers are stuttering their first platitudes to the gentlemen of the jury. But, politically, Pitt is now praised for the very reverse of the qualities which made him and his policy the watchword of his contemporaries. To them it was his staunch support of the king, his proud resistance to all opinions which seemed to savour of French revolutionary principles, his ruthless administration of the law against his adversaries, his long prosecution of the French war, which were his titles to respect and fame. They would not blame, if they could not approve, his lavish expenditure of treasure and his profuse distribution of titles. They stood upon the maintenance, by fair means or foul, of the status quo in Church and State, and they claimed to do so under the shadow of the great name of Pitt. Time has changed all this. These are now incidents in Pitt's career which those who invoke his name are not indisposed to forget. There are now those who are at pains to do for the Tory party what Macaulay did for the Whigs—to prove that in point of virtue, foresight, and statesmanship they are the heirs of all the ages. To such it is a matter of importance to show that the measures which the Whigs brought to completion, and bequeathed as a sort of patrimony to the Liberal party, rested in truth upon principles to which the Liberal party has had no exclusive right. Pitt, as a parliamentary reformer, is therefore a figure which it is worth while to bring into relief. Pitt, as the friend of the West Indian negro, is something of a set-off to the Act of Lord Grey's administration. The Tory party's claims to credit for Roman Catholic emancipation are exactly of that kind which can be very materially strengthened by opposing Pitt's zeal in 1801 to Wellington and Peel's reluctance in 1828. Accordingly, Pitt is cited now as the representative of the Liberal element in the Conservative theory; as the statesman who furnishes for domestic policy, as Canning does for foreign affairs, the fundamental principles of the permanent Conservative creed. This is a natural and an interesting speculation, but it rather deposes the real Pitt in order to set up a simulacrum in his stead. It is true that his orderly and practical mind recoiled from the gross absurdity of sending members to Parliament to represent a grass mound or a stone wall, and of leaving the greatest centres of industry and commerce practically unrepresented. It persuaded him that a man may be no worse a legislator for believing in transubstantiation, and condemning Luther and Melancthon as schismatics, than for holding old-fashioned notions about second intentions or denouncing as unintelligible innovators those who talk about synthetic unities of apperception. But this is a very different thing from saying that he was a Reformer like Earl Grey, or even an Emancipationist like Canning. It is certain that he had no intention of transferring political power from the landed gentry and the great territorial proprietors to the industrial middle classes. Neither had he any more thought of encouraging democracy than of encouraging sansculottism. He resigned office for the sake of the Roman Catholics—no light matter for such a man and at such a time. But he was a parliamentary reformer when he was young and independent, and was conscious that among the rotten boroughs were numbered many Whig strongholds, and that among the unenfranchised manufacturing towns were many who would support the king and Pitt against the prince and the Whigs. When he was supported by a staunch majority who had shown that for their part they had no stomach for reform, and was engaged in the struggle with the republican democracy of France, his zeal for parliamentary reform died away. There is no turpitude in being affected by considerations of votes, nor anything trivial in simply wishing to brush aside grotesque anomalies; but it is too much, on the strength of these things, to cite Pitt as the originator of all that is good in the constitution of 1832. So, too, Roman Catholic emancipation was an important, if not an integral, part of the scheme of the Union, and Pitt very rightly resigned office when he found himself unable to overcome the king's crazy obstinacy upon the point. But, having done so much, he was willing to allow the question to pass; and thereby to postpone emancipation for a quarter of a century. His masterful personality might well, without inhumanity or impropriety, have overcome the repugnance of the king's weak mind. But the Act of Union was safe, and Pitt unhappily allowed the Catholic claims to be reserved for a more convenient season. It is hard to see how, as some modern Tories represent, Pitt can be claimed, on the strength of this, as the parent of full religious toleration, which is loyally accepted by modern Toryism. It is not this paradoxical aspect of a great man that commends itself to the impartial judgment of history. Pitt's administrative shortcomings were many, and it may be that many of the dangers against which he thought it necessary to struggle were illusory. None the less it is certain that England was engaged, and inevitably engaged, in a heroic contest through which she could be brought only by the tenacity and fortitude of the entire nation; and that tenacity and fortitude were awakened and sustained in the minds of millions mainly by the qualities of one man, by the lofty patriotism and indomitable pride of William Pitt.

RELATIONS BETWEEN ENGLAND AND RUSSIA IN THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY.

Angliiski Taini Soviet i ego Istoriya. Chast Vtoraya 1547-1649. V. Alexandrenko. Second Part. (Warsaw.)

PROF. ALEXANDRENKO here gives us the second part of his valuable history of the English Privy Council. Much as the subject has been written about, he finds something new to tell us, as a glance at his references will show. Perhaps the part in which he deals with the relations between England and Russia in the sixteenth century will have most novelty for readers in this country.

Much of the business with our newly-acquired ally was transacted by means of the Privy Council. One of the most interesting episodes is the arrival of the four students in England who were sent to be educated here by Boris Godunov, the vigorous usurper who succeeded Feodor the feeble son of the terrible Ivan. These youths were to be "trayned for a tyme to learn Latin, English, and other languages, as their capacities would give them leave to attayne unto." Meanwhile, years rolled by, and during those years Russia experienced the terrible smutnoye vremya, or "time of troubles," as it is called. The Russians had many things to think of beside the students—the horrors of dynastic changes and invasions by the enemy. In 1617, however, under the peaceful rule of Michael Romanov, a message came through the ambassador, requiring their return to their native country. What the answer was to this request we have no means of knowing, for no documents about it have been preserved; but it was renewed the following year by the ambassadors, Stephen Volinski and Mark Pozdieyev.

The members of the Privy Council replied that two of the students had gone to the East Indies, one was in Ireland and had married there, and the fourth had become a clergyman of the Church of England. This last individual was named Nicephor Alferiev, and appears from Walker's Sufferings of the Clergy to have held some preferment in this country till he was ejected by the Puritans in 1643, after which we hear no more about him.

Prof. Alexandrenko is naturally acquainted with the writings of Bishop Stubbs and Prof. Dicey, whom he frequently quotes, but his notes show that he is equally familiar with many less obvious sources of information, diaries, publications of the Camden Society, and other works. The attitude of the Council in the reign of Elizabeth, when it enjoyed considerable influence, is carefully described. In 1581 we find the Queen, through the Chancellor, informing the Speaker of the House of Commons that the "Commons should not deal or intermeddle with any matters touching Her Majesty's person or estate or church government."

The following are the remarks of our author on the position of the Privy Council in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I.:—"Elizabeth laboured that her councillors might enjoy far greater consideration than that shown to members of Parliament. The recollection of such an attitude on her part towards the council lingered long in the memory of statesmen. But, in spite of all this, we must not forget that even in the time of Elizabeth a silent protest was made against the exaggerated position which the council assumed in her reign. Under the modest declarations of the Commons in the form of petitions, one and the same idea is concealed, that the highest legislative power in the country belongs to the Parliament. In the time of the [first] Stuarts (1603-1649) the authority of the institution declines, the opposition to it increases, and even in the actions of the Council itself there are not seen its former firmness and decision. In appearance the condition and influence of the Council remained almost the same in the time of James I. as in that of Elizabeth, its power was only increased in the matter of the appointment of the judges. Afterwards, by an order issued under the great seal, on June 23, 1618, the Council was to have the right to expel from England Jesuits, Catholic priests, and other adherents of the Papacy convicted of any offence. Among the people the opinion imperceptibly grew up that the Council, and not the king, was responsible for intolerance in these matters."

Englishmen cannot but feel gratified with the attention paid to our constitutional history and literature by Russian authors. The excellent work of Prof. Vinogradov, "Essays on the Social History of England in the Middle Ages," is shortly to appear in an English dress. Prof. Kovalevski has also published a valuable book on the secularisation of monastic property in England and its proximate consequences. Prof. Yanzhul has written on free trade in England; and Prof. Storozhenko, by his valuable works on Robert Greene and the predecessors of Shakspeare, has shown his familiarity with the Elizabethan drama.

We are sorry that with this part of his work, as Prof. Alexandrenko tells us, his useful labour ends. He has produced a careful monograph based upon original research, and giving a clear view of the Privy Council and its functions. We hope that he may be induced on a future occasion to resume the subject.

In Low Relief. By Morley Roberts. In 2 vols. (Chapman & Hall.)

The Moment After. By Robert Buchanan. (Heinemann.)

The Dominant Seventh. By Kate Elizabeth Clark. (Heinemann.)

Leah of Jerusalem. By E. P. Berry. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Notches on the Rough Edge of Life. By L. C. D'Oyle. (Chapman & Hall.)

The Great Dorémi. By C. J. Wills. (Gardner & Co.)

Hypnotized; or, The Doctor's Confession. By Margaret Brandon. (Hutchinson.)

If A Harvest of Weeds is, as there seems every reason to suppose that it is, a first attempt in fiction, the author is to be warmly congratulated upon her maiden effort. The outlines are sketched distinctly and with firmness; the plot, without being altogether original, is well conceived; and although the solution of its mystery is perhaps a little too palpable, the leading motif is sufficiently strong to divert attention from what might otherwise be an awkward defect. Sir Eric Graysbrook, of Graysbrook, leaves at his death a son and heir, Hubert, aged twenty, and a half-brother, Eustace, aged twenty-nine; the latter being constituted Hubert's guardian until his succession to the family estates, which is not to take place before his twenty-fifth birthday. When about four years of the guardianship have expired, the uncle, a man of somewhat grave and severe demeanour, but universally respected for his unblemished integrity of character; and the nephew, a general favourite, but of thoughtless and wild disposition, bestow their affections upon the same lady, Mercy Leyton, a daughter of Lord Melford. At this point commence two brilliant and exceedingly interesting character studies. Sir Hubert, the successful suitor, becomes completely reformed under the wholesome womanly influence of his betrothed. Eustace Graysbrook, smarting under his defeat, allows himself to become the prey of a jealousy which his innate strength of character renders all the more dangerous in its intensity; and when Major Buxton, a superannuated adventurer, arrives on the scene and offers to produce evidence that will have the effect of putting an end to the match, the temptation proves too great to be resisted. And even when the proofs of Hubert's illegitimacy tendered by Major Buxton, and accepted at first as true, turn out to be a mistake, the miserable man, who has succeeded to the property and still hopes to win Mercy Leyton, stifles every remaining scruple of conscience, and consents to pay hush-money for the concealment of the secret. The action of the book is well sustained throughout, and even an episode of detective business is managed with as much ingenuity as such a well-worn subject admits of.

No really good novel has ever been written about university life. Any romantic interest that might be aroused by deeds of daring adventure is liable to be chillingly dispelled by the ignoble spectacle of subsequent gating or rustication, to say nothing of one's feeling of pity for the silly waste of time and of parents' money that such escapades involve; while the love-affairs of undergraduates are only a little less provocative of an indulgent smile than the calf-love of schoolboys. The joint authors of A Fellow of Trinity have struggled with some spirit against the difficulties inseparable from their undertaking, but with only partially successful results. They have, for one thing, wildly overdrawn a good deal of the descriptive matter in their efforts to make the book readable. Miss Bellenden, and her sister, Hebe, who have a sort of footing in Cambridge society, and yet contrive to maintain a gambling den at Chesterton, where, term after term, they at once bewitch and fleece successive generations of freshmen, can hardly be believed to have counterparts in real university life, any more than can the kept mistress, who daily pilots her dog-cart, with its attendant tiger, along Trinity Street and King's Parade, lunches unchaperoned with men in college rooms, and parades herself ostentatiously in broad daylight about the first court of Trinity. However, the struggles, the backslidings, and the ultimate success of Herbert Flowers, the hero, are told with considerable effectiveness; and—excepting his feat of coming out Senior Classic and Second Wrangler, which has but once been paralleled in university records, and only once surpassed—with a fair amount of vraisemblance. By the help of a murder (committed by Miss Hebe Bellenden on the person of an undergraduate, who had detected her in cheating at cards), a suicide, an attempted suicide, a case of delirium tremens, the tragic death of a boating hero in the moment of victory, and a sort of prize-fight between a temperance lecturer and a beer-drinking ruffian at the Barnwell Mission Hall, the sensational character of the story is maintained to the end.

In Low Relief is a good story of Bohemian life, the scene lying chiefly among a colony of artists living in the neighbourhood of Haverstock Hill. There are practically only two prominent characters in the book. John Torrington, an erratic genius and irreclaimable ne'er-do-well, with antecedents far from irreproachable and made to appear still worse than the reality by his own morbid delight in self-disparagement, clever, voluble of tongue, a loafer, and always letting things slide, but with profound depths of passionate feeling, which only wait to be stirred, falls in love with Mary Morris—an artist's model —proposes to her in less than a fortnight after their first acquaintance, and in his impetuous fashion would carry her by storm, if she were not held back by an attachment which she scarcely dares hope may be requited. The other man, Paul Armour, is the reverse of all this. Of good family and education, and possessing some private means, he is of an even and placid temperament, capable of deep affection, but never stirred by any stormy waves of passion. Having schooled himself to regard the claims of his art as paramount, and bachelorhood an essential condition of life until professional success has been achieved, he keeps up a fraternal kind of intimacy with Mary Morris for a year and a half; and it is not until Torrington has asked the girl to be his wife that he discovers that to himself also she is a great deal dearer than a sister. The last volume describes in powerful language the modern substitute for a duel among civilised claimants for a woman's hand. The reader who relishes descriptive analysis of human emotion can scarcely have a greater treat than is here afforded by the author's masterly portrayal of the conscientious struggles, the burning fits of remorse, and the jealous tortures endured by two high-minded men in their agonised endeavours to gain possession of the woman they both love, without either taking an unfair advantage of the other.

Every writer may claim a patient hearing and a measure of belief upon matters which have been his special study; but as soon as he begins to deal with the unknowable, his opinions are of no more value than those of other people. Though Mr. Robert Buchanan has certainly succeeded in making a very weird story of The Moment After, he has done nothing whatever towards solving the question of a future existence. In the novel under notice a murderer is hanged in a very bungling manner, and, being cut down in a senseless condition, subsequently revives. He was led to the scaffold an avowed Atheist, in spite of untiring efforts made with a view to his conversion by the prison chaplain; but his recovery from strangulation is marked by a complete reconciliation with Christian belief, accompanied by a record of strange experiences dating from the moment of losing consciousness of earthly surroundings. He claims to have been caught up, not exactly into the seventh heaven, but into some outlying purlieu of celestial territory, where for many hundreds of years, seemingly, he wanders, going through various phases of repentance and expiation for his crime, until, just as the golden gates of the New Jerusalem are being unfolded for his admission, he is recalled to occupy once again his fleshly tenement and a prison cell, and finds that his absence has not extended over more than an hour or two at most. That the dramatic and descriptive powers exhibited in Mr. Buchanan's book are of a high order may be taken for granted; the value of his speculations will be the subject of rather conflicting estimates. People whose ideas of a future existence are formed upon John Bunyan, and a literal interpretation of the Apocalypse, will agree with Maurizio Modena's prison chaplain in regarding the murderer's vision as confirmatory evidence in proof of orthodox Christian belief; while another class will agree with his doctor in looking upon it as the creation of a disordered brain.

The author of The Dominant Seventh appears to be an American, a transcendentalist, and a musical enthusiast. The book is prefaced by an extract from Schopenhauer, to the effect that life's alternation of desires and gratifications is symbolised in music by the two leading chords, namely the dominant seventh, the chord of unrest of longing and striving, and the tonic chord, the chord of rest and calmness. It is difficult to determine whether the story that follows is intended to exemplify this idea, or whether Miss Clark had any ulterior intention at all beyond writing a novel highly charged with musical metaphysics, which will be uninteresting if not absolutely unintelligible to any reader whose taste is not of the severest classical and Wagnerian type. However, for the benefit of the soulless multitude, there is a romantic love incident with a highly melodramatic ending, which is worth perusal.

Leah of Jerusalem belongs to a class of tales founded on Bible history, of which The Prince of the House of David is probably the most widely known example. The present book embraces a period of nearly seventy years, beginning with the boyhood of Saul of Tarsus, whose subsequent education at Jerusalem under Gamaliel and vigorous persecution of the Nazarenes are described at some length. His conversion and ministrations, ending with his martyrdom under Nero, all find a place in the narrative. Leah, who gives her name to the story, is the daughter of a Jerusalem merchant, and after being taken prisoner by brigands occupying the fastnesses about Jericho, and compelled to marry the chief of the robber band, she is sent as a slave to Rome, where the remainder of her life is passed. Though of a distinctly religious type, this book is full of stirring adventure and incident, the main features of life in the brigands' cave and the persecutions of the Christians by Nero being specially well told.

There has been rather a run of late on the "Wild West," and Notches on the Rough Edge of Life will no doubt be popular enough in consequence. It is a batch of eight stories, descriptive of various phases of life in the Western States, in which cowboys, claims, cattle-branding, bears, drinking bars, euchre, six-shooters, and sporadic Indians largely figure. Some of the stories have already appeared in print; they are all embellished with what appear to be correct and appropriate American idioms, and are fully up to magazine mark.

Any interest that might have been excited by the narrative of The Great Dorémi will be largely discounted by the fact that in all important particulars it has appeared before, in the shape of a story published in the Cornhill Magazine so far back as 1887. An Italian, named Pisani, being outlawed for a conspiracy, assumes the name of Dorémi, and procures a minor engagement in a London opera house. Dr. Baroffski, a Pole, who has invented a contrivance for enabling a singer to produce artificial notes of enormous depth and power, engages Dorémi to exhibit his invention, and the latter at once achieves a European reputation as a bass singer; but Baroffski committing suicide by leaping from a monument, and the vocal instrument being crushed to pieces in the fall, Dorémi's career is cut suddenly short and he retires into obscurity.

Hypnotism appears to be a science of which most of the phenomena exist in the brains of eccentric novelists only. It is pretty certain that the mysterious appearances of white figures described in Hypnotised, or the Doctor's Confession, and the solemn voices coming from nobody knows where, and uttering words of warning or tearful laments, have formed no part of the experience of any healthy-minded human being. Nor up to the present time has any proof been forthcoming of the existence of a "demon power" enabling a gentleman, without preconceived arrangement, to allure a lady down from her bedroom at midnight for an interview with him among the flower beds, and to compel her at a later period to leave her home half-dressed, and pay him a visit on foot through two miles of London streets minus one of her shoes and stockings. Novels dealing with extravagances of this sort are scarcely worth notice. The hospital nurse who narrates the story makes an affectation of vouching for its truth, but this only aggravates the offence.

J. BARROW ALLEN.

TWO EDITIONS OF PLUTARCH.

Plutarch's Lives of Galba and Otho. With Introduction and Explanatory Notes by E. G. Hardy. (Macmillan.) It is a sad change to pass from Tacitus to Plutarch. We pass from the unscrupulous and brilliant rhetorician to a writer honest, occasionally witty, but with no gift of style. Yet a microscopic eye sees that the two authors have much in common—much in what they omit, in what they tell, and in their way of telling it. Evidence, both external and internal, forbids us to think that Plutarch borrowed his account from Tacitus; and "since the resemblances are too great to be the result of accident, our only alternative is to ascribe them to the employment by both historians of a common authority."—Of such resemblances Mr. Hardy gives a long and curious list, but no instance is more striking than one which he has not included. Τὸν Σερβίαν οἶκον, says Plutarch (Galba, 3), where of course he meant the house of the Sulpicii, and not of the Servii; and yet Tacitus (Hist. 2, 48) also writes Post Julios Claudios Servios.—Dr. Mommsen has found the common original of both authors in Cluvius Rufus. To this hypothesis Mr. Hardy raises some serious difficulties, and he suggests the elder Pliny. But the common passages, which, on this theory, owe their real origin to Pliny, seem to us both brighter and deeper in thought than what that author is elsewhere wont to turn out. It is impossible to overpraise the loving care which Mr. Hardy has spent upon his Plutarch. The result is a book more serious and mature than his Juvenal, and, we think, even superior to his edition of Pliny's Correspondence with Trajan. It differs from most school books in not laying itself out to teach grammar, and Mr. Hardy modestly disclaims that lexicographical knowledge of Plutarch which makes Dr. Holden's editions so valuable; but his notes are strong on history and constitutional points. As good specimens we may cite the notes on the priest-hoods (Otho, 1) and on the mutiny of the seventeenth cohort (Otho, 3). They are excellent models, the one of plain exposition, the other of pointing out difficulties and dealing with them. We have made the following observations in reading Mr. Hardy's commentary: (1) The comma in Galba 29 at ἀγνοοῖσθαι should probably be struck out. (2) The name on p. xlvii. should be read Vipstanus. (3) Where is it said that Vitellius pardoned Salvius Titianus because of his old age? (p. cvi.). (4) P. cix. For "sixteen" read "sixteen cohorts." (5) Nymphidius was not actually struck with a spear (p. 22), see Galba, 14. (6) There is some confusion between Lycophron and Polyphron on pp. 1, 89. (7) Galba, c. 4, l. 2. Does ἐκείνῳ mean "in Nero's interest"? This explanation might perhaps be defended by a similar dative in Otho, c. 5, l. 12, but ἐκείνῳ would be more likely to refer to Galba, "under his eyes." Galba was alluded to in ἐκείνῳ at the end of c. 3. (8) C. 8, φορέδην is "in a litter" rather than "with haste." (9) C. 13, l. 5, ἀντὶ surely means Gellianus, not Nymphidius, "he had never been allowed to come near Galba." (10) C. 26, ἐκπαδὸν ἵστασθαι κ.τ.λ. hardly "to make away with the usurper." Say rather "Let him stand aside." (11) Otho, c. 5. The MS. reading προσπορεύσασθαι is untranslatable. Mr. Hardy follows Reiske in reading πρὸς αὐτὸν πορεύσασθαι. Might we conjecture πρὸς δὲ πορεύσασθαι? (12) C. 9, ἀπὸ κρημνοῦ seems to us to depend, not on ἐγκαταλύμενον, but on μεθεῖναι. (13) C. 13, εὐλογεῖν has nothing to do with "a good name"; it rather means "to act or consult wisely."

Plutarch's Life of Timoleon. With Introduction, Notes, Maps, and Lexicon. By H. A. Holden. (Cambridge: University Press.) We have here another of those singularly complete pieces of work of which Dr. Holden has, in recent years, given so many to the world. It seems to be his plan to take a moderately short text, to lavish on it all the resources of a scholarship such as few editors can match, and to make the edition complete by placing within its covers everything which is needed for the translation, understanding, and appreciation of the author. The purchaser of one of Dr. Holden's books need not look outside for any sort of help. The Life of Timoleon is one of the most interesting of all Plutarch's biographies. The story is striking, and the author has told it well. But a modern Plutarch would be more likely to compare Timoleon with Garibaldi than with Aemilius Paulus. The careers of the two great liberators of Sicily present, as Dr. Holden says (after A. Holm), many striking points of resemblance. The disproportion of the means employed to the great results achieved is remarkable in both cases. But it is curious that, while tales of miracles attached themselves to the exploits of Timoleon, Garibaldi's career, though so full of adventure, has never, so far as we know, been decorated by any hint of supernatural favour. Is this, perchance, because Garibaldi was an enemy of the popedom? Dr. Holden's text is, in the main, that of Sintenis. In C. xxx. 5 he has introduced a conjecture of his own, τῆς δίκης αὐτοῖς ἀπολογουμένοις τὴν Τιμόλεοντος εὐτυχίαν ἐπιθεμένην, instead of Sintenis's τῆς Δίκης αὐτοῖς ἀπολογουμένης τῇ Τ. εὐτυχίᾳ ἐπιθεμένης. It is, indeed, a desperate place, and we are not sure that this emendation helps much. It would be translated "Punishment being laid upon them, when they renounced T.'s success." But when or how did they renounce it? There is not a word about renunciation. Dr. Holden will, we hope, allow us to subjoin a few notes made in reading his commentary. (1) C. iii. γραφόντων, "while they were writing down the names" (H). Why not "proposing names"? (2) C. iii. μήτε προσίδοντα τοῖς κοινῶς ἔτι, "though he had not yet taken part in public business" (H). But C. v. i. 25 shows that the meaning is, "he no longer took part." (3) C. v. δυναστας, "the oligarchical party" (H). But the sense wanted is "despots," and the lexicon translates δ. by dominus or princeps. (4) C. xvi. τὴν πόλιν παραλαβόντες ὅππῃ πατρίδα καθαρῶς καὶ πιστῶς διεφύλαξαν. "assuming charge of it as if it had been their own native city" (H). It would seem more natural to take ὅππ. with διεφ.; and we suspect that καθαρῶς does not mean "unselfishly," but refers to the absence of outrages against the families of their hosts. (5) C. xvi. the words ἀργῶς καὶ ἀειμύως occur in the Timoleon, C. xviii, as well as in Xenophon. (6) C. xvi. μετ' αἰτίας ἰδίας, "with a personal motive" (H, note). The lexicon more correctly explains it of blame given to the man. (7) C. xix. ἀμφισβήτησιν, "pretence" (H). Query, "pretext"? (8) p. 102, "One division of T.'s forces would naturally advance along the banks of the Anapus to attack Neapolis." Dr. Holden's map throws no light on this movement. (9) C. xxi., εἰ διαπέπλευκεν ὁ στόλος, "whether the fleet had crossed" (H). This must mean the second fleet—see CC. 13, 14. (10) C. xxxii., ὑπὸ τῶν στρατιωτῶν "by Timoleon's soldiers" (H, note); "by the garrison" (marginal analysis)—Hiketias's soldiers. No doubt the latter is correct.

NOTES AND NEWS.

AMONG the tablets from Tel el-Amarna, now in the museum at Berlin, five have lately been found which were sent from Urusalim or Jerusalem to the Egyptian kings. Their writer was a certain Additaba or Hadad-tob, who claims to have been a tributary and protected prince, and not merely an Egyptian governor, like the rulers of most of the other cities in Palestine. He declares that he had been appointed to his office by "the oracle of the mighty king," who is shown by a passage in one of the tablets to have been a deity. Additaba further speaks of having had dealings with the Babylonians, and refers to an oracle which declared that, as long as a ship crossed the sea, the conquests of Nahrina or Aram-Naharaim and of Babylonia would continue. This, it must be remembered, was at the close of the fourteenth century B.C. Prof. Sayce had already discovered the name of Jerusalem in one of the tablets now in the Ghizeh Museum (see ACADEMY, April 19, p. 273.)

MR. WILLIAM SHARP has left England for the winter, intending first to spend two months at Heidelberg, and afterwards to pass on to Rome. He has taken with him the materials for the Life of Joseph Severn, the friend of Keats, with which he was entrusted by Severn's sons some time ago. It need hardly be said that these materials include a vast number of interesting letters, covering the period of Severn's sixty years' sojourn at Rome, during which he was brought into relations with every eminent English and American visitor. The work will probably be compressed into one volume, and published by Messrs. Sampson Low.

MR. JOHN MURRAY has in the press a memoir of the early art-life and dramatic career of Jenny Lind, from 1820 to 1851, written from original documents, letters, diaries, &c., by Canon Scott Holland and Mr. W. S. Rockstro. It will be in two volumes, with portraits and other illustrations.

MESSRS. GEORGE BENTLEY & SON will publish immediately a third volume of The Correspondence of Princess Lieven and Earl Grey, covering the period from 1834 to 1841. Like the former volumes, it has been translated by Mr. Guy Le Strange, who has added notes; and it will be illustrated with facsimiles.

THE same publishers announce My Life, by Thomas Sidney Cooper, R.A., in two volumes, with portrait and illustrations. It will include reminiscences not only of a past generation of artists—such as Constable, Turner, Stanfield, Stodart, Wilkie, Lawrence, Maclise, and Mulready—but also of Mrs. Siddons, of Byron and his set, and of Sir Robert Peel.

MESSRS. SEELEY & Co. will publish shortly a volume entitled Scenes connected with the Life of Alfred, Lord Tennyson, written by the Rev. A. J. Church, and illustrated with fourteen copperplates and many other engravings from drawings by Mr. Edward Hull.

MR. AUSTIN FRYERS has sent to press with Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein & Co. a novel entitled A New Lady Audley.

MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS, of New York—who for nearly half a century have been represented in this country by Messrs. Sampson Low—have now resolved to establish an agency firm of their own, under the title of Osgood, McIlvaine, & Co., with a place of business in Albemarle Street. The head of this is Mr. James R. Osgood, whose name is associated with the pleasantest traditions of publishing in New England, and who has himself made many friends here during a four years' residence in London as the representative of Messrs. Harper & Brothers. After the delay of a few months, Harper's Magazine will be transferred to the new firm; but the publication of Harper's Young People will remain in the hands of Messrs. Sampson Low. It is hoped that this arrangement "will tend to promote still closer and more friendly connexions between authors and publishers both in England and America."

THE first meeting of the eighteenth session of the New Shakspeare Society will be held at University College, Gower Street, on Friday next, October 24, at 8 p.m., when Dr. Furnivall will read a paper on "A Lover's Complaint." Among the publications which the society has in hand is a "Shakspeare Holinshed," consisting of extracts from Holinshed's Chronicle compared with Shakspeare's Histories, edited by Mr. W. G. Boswell-Stone.

MR. WILLIAM MORRIS will lecture at the Athenaeum Hall, Tottenham Court Road, on Monday next, October 20, at 8.30 p.m., on "Art for the People," in connexion with the "Commonweal" branch of the Socialist League.

THE first series of lectures provided by the Sunday Lecture Society will begin on Sunday next, October 19, at St. George's Hall, when Prof. Silvanus P. Thompson will lecture at 4 p.m. on "Waves of Light: a Lay Sermon," with illustrations and experiments. Lectures will subsequently be given by Dr. B. W. Richardson, Mr. A. Elley Finch, Dr. Andrew Wilson, Mr. Willmott Dixon, Mr. Arthur Nicols, and Sir A. C. Lyall.

THE second meeting of the North Midland Library Association was held at Newark-upon-Trent on Thursday, October 9, when the chair was occupied by the president, Mr. Briscoe, of Nottingham. Mr. Midworth (of the Newark Stock Library) read a paper on "A Librarian's Duty towards his Readers"; Mr. Briscoe contributed "Notes on Early Newark Printing and Booksellers"; and Mr. Radford (of Nottingham) gave a résumé of the parent association's meeting at Reading. The free, proprietary, and parish church libraries were visited, and also the private library of Mr. Branston. The next meeting of this society will be held in December at Leicester.

THE eleventh branch free public reading-room was opened at Nottingham on Monday last, October 13.

THE twenty-first Fascicule of the Archives Historiques de la Gascogne is "Lettres d'un Cadet de Gascogne sous Louis XIV., François de Sarraaméa, capitaine au regiment de Languedoc." The volume is carefully edited with introduction and notes (pp. xix. 90) by M. F. Abbadie. The letters cover the twenty-eight years from 1694 to 1722. The writer joined his regiment in his sixteenth year, and served chiefly on the Rhine and the Flemish frontier. His letters give an excellent idea of the ordinary life of a French officer on active service under Louis XIV.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN have issued this week, in their cheap edition of the works of Charles Kingsley, a volume of sermons entitled The Good News of God. Judging from the bibliographical history recorded on the verso of the title-page, the popularity of some of Kingsley's sermons would seem to rival that of his novels. This particular collection first came into the present publishers' hands in 1863. Between that date and Kingsley's death in 1875 it was twice reprinted; but since then no less than nine editions have been called for, six of them in the last ten years.

FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

WE understand that the forthcoming number of the Nineteenth Century will contain articles by the following:—Mr. Gladstone, Prof. Huxley, the Duke of Argyll, Earl Grey, Prince Krapotkin, and the Hon. Emily Lawless.

THE forthcoming number of the English Historical Review will contain an article by Lord Acton, entitled "Doellinger's Historical Work," which is based largely upon personal knowledge. Among the other contents will be "Northumbrian Tenures," by Prof. Maitland; "The Growth of Oligarchy in English Towns," by Mr. C. W. Colby; and "The English in the Levant," by Mr. J. Theodore Bent.

THE first number of Mr. Buchanan's new review is announced for publication early in December. It will be called the Modern Review, and one of its features will be a succinct survey of the criticism of the month. No list of contributors is yet published; but the editor announces his determination to secure good matter, quite irrespective of great names. The review is described as eclectic, and contributions are invited from both friends and foes.

WITH the November number the Century Magazine will enter upon its twenty-first year. The programme includes a selection from the much-talked-of Talleyrand Memoirs, arranged by Mr. Whitelaw Reid, the American minister at Paris; an account by Mr. W. Woodville Rockstro, the Chinese scholar, of his recent adventurous journey in disguise through Tibet, illustrated from photographs and curious objects brought back by him; a series of illustrated papers on "The Gold-Hunters of California," written by pioneers of that movement, including the late Gen. Frémont; and a serial story of village life by Mr. Frank R. Stockton, entitled "The Squirrel Inn," illustrated by Mr. A. B. Frost.

THE Christmas number of the Art Journal, to be published with the November magazines, will be devoted to the life and work of Mr. Birket Foster. The text is written by Mr. Marcus B. Huish, the editor, who will describe the artist's house in Surrey and its decorations designed by Mr. Burne Jones. The illustrations, numbering forty in all, will include an etching by Mr. Birket Foster, entitled "The Little Shepherds," and steel engravings after his pictures of "The Convalescent" and "Primrose Gatherers."

THE forthcoming number of the United Service Magazine will contain "Gerrymandering in Africa," by Sir Charles Dilke; "The War Training of the Navy," a reply to Sir Geoffrey Hornby, by Capt. Fitzgerald; "Gordon's Death—What is the Truth?";

"Obstacles to Imperial Federation," by Gen. Strange; and "Notes and Queries on Naval Warfare," by Admiral Sir George Elliott.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

THE ceremony of conferring the honorary degree of LL.D. upon Mr. H. M. Stanley at Cambridge, which was unavoidably postponed last June, will take place on Thursday next, October 23, at 2 p.m.

DR. SMITH'S prizes at Cambridge have been awarded to Mr. R. A. Sampson, of St. John's, for his essay on "Stokes's Current Function"; and to Mr. W. E. Brunyate, of Trinity, for his essay on "The Associated Concomitants of Ternary Forms."

MR. J. G. ADAMI, who has just been elected to the studentship of pathology at Cambridge on the John Lucas Walker foundation, proposes to spend part of the winter at Paris, in order to devote himself to an investigation at the Pasteur Institute of the means by which it is possible to confer immunity against infectious disease.

MR. D. G. RITCHIE, of Jesus College, Oxford, has written a little work for the "Social Science Series" of Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein & Co., to be entitled The Principles of State Interference: Four Essays on the Political Philosophy of Mr. Herbert Spencer, J. S. Mill, and T. H. Green.

MR. J. H. MIDDLETON, Slade professor of fine art at Cambridge, announces for the current term a course of five lectures on "Italian Art," dealing specially with the age of Dante, the growth of Florence, the Shrine of Orcagna, and Verrocchio as painter and sculptor.

At the meeting of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society on Monday next, October 20, Mr. F. J. H. Jenkinson, the university librarian, will exhibit and describe a letter from a London stationer to John Siberch, the first Cambridge printer (1521).

PROF. R. STUART POOLE will, during the present session, conduct a series of classes on "The Principles of Archaeology" at University College, London. The introductory lecture will be given on Wednesday next, October 22, at 5 p.m. This will be followed by a course on "Egyptian Archaeology," on Mondays, by the professor; a course on "Prehistoric Archaeology," on Thursdays, by Mr. Arthur J. Evans, keeper of the Ashmolean Museum; and a course on "Phoenician Archaeology," by the professor. The introductory lectures are free to the public; and each lecture of the several courses will be followed by a visit to the British Museum.

THE value of the bequest to the University College of North Wales under the will of Dr. Evan Thomas, of Manchester, is announced to be £39,500.

VERSE.

ON SOME REMAINS OF GREEK GARLANDS IN THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

Blossoms of old, ravaged yellow,
And of broken petals shed;
Each dreary rose against its fellow
In a garland that is dead:
Once Greek fingers wreathed them, tying Flower-stem to papyrus-stalk—
One wreath with another vying.
Close-leaved myrtle of the lover
Here in crumbling wand is traced;
Here did chrysanthemum quite cover
Twigs with which it was enlaced,
In its ranks of florets golden,
By the date-palm's sapless strips,
Scarcely in the twist beholden.

Nightshade and its berries ruddy
With sweet marjoram were blent;
The berries still to eyes that study
These twined fragments, dun and shent,
In their pretty twos, or single,
Form small circlets that are red
On the dust with which they mingle.

Marjoram in this was wedded
With Egyptian lilies blue;
Here blooms of helichrysos threaded
Mid the olive's chequered hue.
Did narcissus cluster lightly,
Flower on jocund flowerhead, once
Round this wrinkled hoop unsightly?

Limpid chalice of the roses,
Outburst delicate of light,
Faint breeze of colour that discloses
All a flower is—from our sight
These are gone; the orange circle
Of the anthers in their mass
Now a blot of roan and purple.

For dire Egypt, the preserver
Of the perished things of time,
In senseless monumental fervour
Took these blossoms of her clime,
Took and sealed them, contravening
Their own beauty's sweetest law,
They should disappear ere evening.

OBITUARY.

PROF. THOROLD ROGERS AND PROF. SELLAR.

THE universities of Oxford and Edinburgh have each lost during the past week one of their best known members—Prof. Thorold Rogers and Prof. Sellar, who (however unlike in most respects) happened to be almost contemporaries in age, and to die on the same day, Sunday last, October 12.

James Edwin Thorold Rogers was born at the little village of West Meon, Hampshire, in 1823, being the ninth son of his father. Another son was the late Dr. Joseph Rogers, whose Reminiscences as a workhouse medical officer were published by his brother only last year. Educated first at King's College, London—to which he was destined to return as Tooke professor of political economy—he matriculated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, in March, 1843. After the comparatively short course of three years, he obtained a first class in literæ humaniores in Easter term, 1846, along with Sir Francis Sandford and Theodore Walrond. Shortly afterwards he joined Worcester College, but he was never a member of any foundation. At about this time also he took orders in the Church of England; but he renounced them by a formal deed as soon as such a course was authorised by Act of Parliament, in a company which included Dr. Congreve, Mr. Leslie Stephen, and the present Judge-Advocate-General. For some years he was known only as a private coach, reading widely in many subjects, and devoted to academical affairs. During the two years 1857 and 1858 he acted as examiner in the final classical school. In 1862 he was appointed by Convocation to the Drummond chair of political economy, in succession to Charles Neate. The appointment was only for five years; but it had been the custom to re-elect the professor for a second time, if he desired it. When, however, the time for his re-election came on, the enemies whom he had exasperated by his Radicalism and his freedom of speech avenged themselves by preferring Prof. Bonamy Price. There can be no doubt that this rebuff embittered him against his own university, and drove him to seek consolation in political life. From 1880 to 1886 he was M.P. for Southwark. Prof. Bonamy Price was duly re-elected for a second term; but on his death in 1888 Prof. Thorold

Rogers was again appointed to the vacant chair, with the unanimous approval of both friend and foe. The first-fruits of his lectures were published before the end of that year, in a volume entitled The Economic Interpretation of History (Fisher Unwin, 1888), which is perhaps the most characteristic work of its author, both in its merits and in its defects. The book, of course, upon which his future fame will rest, when his personal idiosyncracies are forgotten, is his History of Agriculture and Prices in England from 1259 to 1793 (six vols., Clarendon Press, 1866 to 1888). This monumental undertaking, conceived and carried out with more than German thoroughness, was suggested by his researches among the accounts in the bursaries of Oxford colleges, which have the advantage of being kept continuously from early times on a uniform system; but it grew until it became a complete economical history of the country, based upon an immense body of documentary evidence. The two last volumes, published in 1888, bring the record down to 1703; but it is understood that the author was well-advanced with two more volumes, which would complete the original design, dealing largely with questions of finance. Prof. Rogers himself prepared a popular abridgment of this work, under the title of Six Centuries of Work and Wages (Sonnenschein, 1885), and of this a yet further condensation was issued in the same year. Of his numerous other publications we must be content only to mention his Protests of the Lords from 1624 to 1874, with historical introductions (three vols., 1875); his annotated edition of The Wealth of Nations (two vols., 1880); The First Nine Years of the Bank of England (1887)—a unique study in financial history; his collection of the Speeches of his friend, John Bright; and his article on "Finance" in the Encyclopædia Britannica.

William Young Sellar was born at Goldspie, Sutherlandshire, in 1825, being an elder brother of A. Craig Sellar, whose death earlier in the present year was a loss to politics. Like so many other eminent Scotsmen of our time, he was educated at the Edinburgh Academy. Thence he went to Balliol College, Oxford, first as a Snell exhibitioner and afterwards as a scholar. He matriculated in December 1842, when only seventeen years of age; and he was placed in the first class in Easter term 1847, along with the present Earl of Kimberley and the late C. D. Ross, of Wadhams. In the following year he was elected to a fellowship at Oriel, but he did not remain long at Oxford. After acting as assistant-professor successively at Durham, Glasgow, and St. Andrews, and having been for some time professor of Greek at the last mentioned university, he was appointed in 1863 to the valuable chair of humanity (or Latin) at Edinburgh, which he held till his death. Apart from a small volume of Selections from Martial (Edinburgh 1884), edited in collaboration with Prof. G. G. Ramsay, we are not aware that he ever attempted the highest walk of classical scholarship, by which Munro, Conington, and Ellis earned their European reputation. But his two volumes of Essays on the Latin Poets have made his learning, his brilliancy, and his taste known to a wide circle of English readers. Of these, The Roman Poets of the Republic, first published in 1863, appeared in a revised and enlarged form in 1881 (Clarendon Press); and The Roman Poets of the Augustan Age first in 1877, and in a second edition in 1884. The latter volume, despite its title, is confined to Virgil; but it is understood that the author had in preparation a companion volume on Horace and the Elegiac Poets, an anticipation of which may be gathered from his series of articles in the Encyclopædia Britannica.

THE COMING PUBLISHING SEASON.

CORRESPONDENCE.

OGAMS AND RUNES IN MANN.

Cambridge: Oct. 11, 1890.

In the ACADEMY of November 26, 1887 (pp. 359-61), Lord Southesk gave a full and interesting account of an ogam inscription, discovered by the Rev. E. B. Savage, on one of the rune-bearing sculptured stones of the Isle of Mann. It is on the stone at Kirk Michael, which has played a large part in the discussion, by Dr. Isaac Taylor and others, of the relative ages of the two runic alphabets in Mann. The ogams run up (or, as Lord Southesk reads them, down) the middle of the back of the stone, between the two runic inscriptions which run up the two sides of the back.

There is on this same stone a complete ogam "alphabet," b, l, f, . . . i. It is on the face of the stone, a little below the ornamental cross with its flankings of harpist, men, and animals. The alphabet runs up the stone, and is 8½ inches long; the vowels are full-length digits, unlike all other known ogams in Mann except those on the back of this stone. Mr. P. Kermodé discovered it and told me of its existence; but a good many of the digits had not been made out—indeed, the whole alphabet is invisible to the untrained eye. By securing a S.E., S., and S.W. sun, and using ropes to move the branches of the tree which overhangs the cross, I read all the ogams but m and g, and these came out like a fine spider's web in a rubbing with a soft pencil on thin paper.

The stone is 5 ft. 9½ in. long. While the runes at the back commence nearly at the bottom and run to the top, the sculptured cross on the face only occupies the upper 3 ft., leaving nearly 3 ft. blank below, where the alphabet is. This is so unusual that I can only suppose that the sculptor was later than the ogamist, and had sufficient respect for the little ogams to cut his own design short, rather than interfere with them. I need scarcely say that this raises many interesting questions.

There is in the parish of Arbory, in the south of the island, besides the fine ogam inscription cunamagli ma . . ., an ogam inscription which I believe has not been published. It is difficult to get at, being under a water-butt, and the ogams are rudely cut. I felt a good deal of hesitation in reading it ma qleog, or possibly ma qleogu; but I see that Mr. A. W. Moore, in his very interesting and valuable book, Surnames and Place-names of the Isle of Man (1890), remarks that Prof. Rhys has read on an ogam stone at Arbory the name Mac Leog. Clague is still a local name there, in one or other of its various forms. These two ogam inscriptions are within three miles of the two Ballaqueeny ogams, which Prof. Rhys has described in the ACADEMY.

May I suggest the possibility of a simple explanation of the origin of the forms of ogams, and of some of the puzzling difficulties connected with ogam writing? I have never liked the idea of the early Celt or Teuton sitting down to invent the ogam "alphabet" for cutting on wood or stone, and doing it so injudiciously. Some explanation more simple and more appropriate is, I think, called for. I do not see why there may not have been, in the early times to which any consideration of this kind takes us, a system of "cryptic speech," in connexion, perhaps, with magical arts, by means of finger signs, corresponding to our modern "deaf and dumb alphabet," but carefully not reproducing, as that alphabet does, the forms of the written letters. If the left hand is held up palm inwards, 5 letters are indicated by applying to its right edge 5, 4, 3, 2, 1, of the digits of the right hand. Five more are indicated by applying the digits of the left hand to the left edge of the right. The first ten ogams of the Book of Ballymote are merely pictures of these processes. The vowels are simply shown by holding the left hand horizontally, and touching the palm with the points of the 5, 4, 3, 2, 1, digits of the right hand (Welsh and Irish); or, by laying the upper parts of the digits, or the whole digits, across the palm (Scottish); the five remaining letters by laying the digits transversely across the left hand. The tradition that there were once only 16 "awgryms" points, perhaps, to a time when the fingers only were used, not the thumbs. The objection against ogams, as characters for incision on stone or wood, that 5 scores are required for letters of frequent occurrence—n, r, i, g, and only one score for a letter of which there is scarcely one indisputable example, namely h, disappears on this supposition. Indeed, it may be argued that it is a simpler and more elementary process to apply all the digits than to apply one, or two, or three; and it might be said that the order of convenience for cryptic speech inverts the order of convenience for stone-cutting. A mere glance at the ogam diphthongs will show how easily they may be taken to represent crooked and crossed fingers. Some of the bold ogams, as at St. Dognael's, look very like the marks of fingers; while an i on a worn stone is so like the knuckles of a clenched fist as to suggest that the vowels may have been indicated by touching the knuckles. The reference to "cryptic speech" does not mean that I believe there is anything cryptic in the ordinary use of ogams for memorial purposes. It gives a flavour to my theory, and it suggests the type of alphabet which the original ogam signs represented.

To return to Mann. I found in Malew churchyard a second example of Sigurd with his burnt thumb in his mouth, holding in the other hand the spit with the Fafnir's heart. The first example, at Andreas, I interpreted in January 1887 (see Mr. J. R. Allen's account in the Journal of the Brit. Arch. Ass., p. 260). I now find that, among other coins dug up in Andreas churchyard some thirty years ago, were coins of Danish kings of Dublin, including Onlaf. This gives great significance to the presence of the eagle at the man's ear, dead snake, and double-edged sword, on the panel of the Leeds cross, along with which the runes Kun . . . Onlaf were found. Mann, where their coins are found, was pretty sure from its geographical position to be visited by the Danish Onlafs, &c., who were kings both of Dublin and of Northumbria; and the presence of their ancestor Sigurd on stones in the north and south of the island and at one of the old Northumbrian royal residences is an interesting fact. The question whether the Leeds panel, which gives symbols as it were and omits the graphic details of the saga, or the Mann sculptures which give the graphic details, should be taken to be the earlier, is to be answered, I think, in favour of the graphic details. This would give to some of the non-rune-bearing sculptured stones of Mann a date earlier than that usually assigned to them.

In connexion with a controversy in the ACADEMY on the readings of the Manx runes by the late Dr. Vigfusson, I may say that, having gone carefully through all the inscriptions on the spot, I feel convinced that Dr. Vigfusson misread when working in his study the notes which he had made when inspecting the stones. In almost every case of difference, as it seems to me, Mr. Kermodé was right, and the support which Dr. Isaac Taylor's study of Sir H. Dryden's casts gave to Mr. Kermodé's readings was well founded; in several cases there is not the slightest question.

I earnestly hope that when next I visit Mann, the wonderful treasures which the island possesses on perishing slate-stones will have been safely housed under cover in a good light, each in its own parish.

JUNIUS'S TRANSCRIPTS OF OLD-ENGLISH TEXTS.

Ghent, Belgium: October 13, 1890.

Dr. Sweet, in his amiable answer to my "useless and misleading" communication on this subject, flies off at a tangent into a most amusing passion—amusing because it has no foundation whatever in my former letter. He tries to blind the eyes of your readers by ignoring my real point and misstating the case I have made out. May I briefly reply to his strictures?

To begin with, I have misquoted Dr. Sweet. I plead guilty to the charge, and duly apologise. But, however regrettable, my misquotation has nothing whatever to do with the question at issue, viz., whether or no Junius's transcripts are generally reliable.

Dr. Sweet next tells us that he and every other Old-English specialist knew all about what I have said "for the last fifteen years." While congratulating Mr. Sweet on this knowledge, I may ask: What is the use of this statement? Did I not say myself in as many words that I did not claim to be the first to point this out, while giving my reasons for doing so once more?

And now for the gravest charge of all. "The only interest about Junius is the accuracy of the copy" (Gregory's Pastoral Care, p. xix.). These words certainly do refer to the copy of the "Pastoral Care," and to that alone. But I did not, and do not, lay any stress on this. I have not the slightest reason to assert that this copy is inaccurate. But anyone who has carefully read my former letter will have seen that we have reason to doubt the accuracy of other Junius copies; and if Junius is capable of making such a mess of one transcript, the fact that "a few fragments of the original MS. which had escaped 'the great fire in the Cottonian library' do not yield any discrepancies does not make superfluous a caution against Junius's transcripts in general.

We all know the story of the person who, years ago, when Latin was the language of academical disputes, maintained that he could always find out who was in the wrong without understanding a single word of the dispute. He observed the faces of the disputants, and bravely declared against him who first showed the symptoms of anger. It is, perhaps, needless to draw the moral.

THE ETYMOLOGY OF "BLUNT."

Copenhagen: Sept. 25, 1890.

Dr. Murray's Dictionary, under "blunt," says: "Etymology unknown," and gives two reasons why "blunt" cannot be derived from the past participle of the old Scandinavian blunda.

1. That blunda was intransitive in Old Norse and the past participle could hardly exist there. However, since this part of the Dictionary appeared, the past participle has been unearthed. In Söderwall: Ordbok öfver svenska Medeltids-Språket (Lund, 1884, ff) an early Middle Swedish passage is quoted on p. 127, in which blundadhöm üghom, i.e., "with eyes asleep, with shut eyes," occurs. This is dative plural of the past participle blundadher.

2. That past participles in -nt from -nd are not found so early as 1200. Ormin has none. This is so. But in lines 14,583 and 17,531 the past participle forrgart is found in Ormulum. This is neuter singular, which is used by Ormin for all genders, as in the case of wannt; it is the Danish forgett (in the old Danish laws), the Icelandic gert, gört. On the other hand, blind occurs in Old Icelandic compounds, and sometimes in the adjectival meaning of "blunt": blind-stafir, blind-skaka, Blund-Retill. The last is the name of a man who was also called Retill Blundr.

Now I submit that Orm has treated blundr, blind as a participial adjective; and, in analogy with forrgart and wannt, formed the neuter blunnt, to be used for all genders, as in other cases.

It seems to me that the two difficulties in the derivation of this word are thus removed. Compare also the German blintz-eln.

MR. HOSKIER'S MS. OF THE GOSPELS.

Liebigstrasse 9, Leipzig: October 8, 1890.

I regret not to have seen before this evening the ACADEMY for August 23, in which Mr. H. C. Hoskier says: (1) That to the best of his recollection he supplied me with particulars of his MS. in 1887: and (2) that he would have written further if he had known when Prolegomena II. was to appear. As for (1), Mr. Hoskier's courteous communications are now lying before me, and none of them betrays any knowledge of a MS. not already on the list. As for (2), on June 27, 1887, he joins with me in the hope, expressed in my letter of June 12, that the Prolegomena would appear within a year's time.

POETRY AND SCIENCE IN FOLK-LORE.

London: Oct. 15, 1890.

My friend Mr. Yeats is somewhat unjust in the slighting reference to the Folk-Lore Journal which ends his letter in the ACADEMY of October 11. I would remind Mr. Yeats that he is indebted to the Journal for one of the tales in his "Camelot Series" volume, and that he might have found another fine tale (Grey Norris from Warland) in the same pages. But it is hardly fair to compare the Transactions of a learned society, which are in duty bound to collect and print much that is fragmentary and of value only to experts, with a volume intended for the public at large.

Mr. Yeats will be glad to hear that Dr. Hyde's English version of the Irish tales published by him last year will be ready almost immediately. In Dr. Hyde's absence, the task of passing the last sheets through the press has fallen to me, and I trust that within three weeks at the latest I shall have returned the last page for press.

APPOINTMENTS FOR NEXT WEEK.

SUNDAY, Oct. 19, 4 p.m. South Place Institute: "Siberia," by Prince Kropotkin.

4 p.m. Sunday Lecture Society: "Waves of Light—A Lay Sermon," with Illustrations and Experiments, by Prof. Silvanus P. Thompson.

MONDAY, Oct. 20, 4 p.m. Royal Academy: "The Muscles of the Human Body," I., by Prof. John Marshall.

5 p.m. Hellenic Society: "A Drum of a Column from Ephesus," by Mr. A. H. Smith; "Recent Researches in Cilicia," by Mr. Theodore Bent.

FRIDAY, Oct. 24, 4 p.m. Royal Academy: "The Muscles of the Human Body," II., by Prof. John Marshall.

8 p.m. New Shakspeare: "A Lover's Complaint," by Dr. F. J. Furnivall.

8 p.m. London Amateur Scientific Society: "Turreted Gastropods," by Mr. H. W. Burrows.

SCIENCE.

South-African Butterflies: a Monograph of the Extra-tropical Species. By Roland Trimen, Curator of the South African Museum, Capetown; assisted by James Henry Bowker. Vol. III., Papilionidae and Hesperidae, 436 pages and 3 plates. (Kegan Paul & Co.)

We have here the completion of one of the most satisfactory executed local Faunas of an interesting part of the globe which has long been issued, reminding us more of Kirby's famous Monographia Apum Angliae than of any other recent work. The two previous volumes, which were noticed in the ACADEMY at the times of their publication, contained the family Nymphalidae, consisting of their sub-families Acraeinae, Danainae, Satyrinae, Nymphalinae, and the Lycaenidae and Erycinidae. The present volume contains the Papilionidae, with the sub-family Pierinae, and the extensive family of the Skipper butterflies or Hesperidae.

Of the Pierideous family of the white and yellow butterflies (of which our common garden whites and our clouded yellows are excellent types) Mr. Trimen enumerates and very carefully describes sixty distinct species; of the true Papilionidae (which ought to be regarded as the real type of the order, and of which our common swallow-tail Papilio Machaon is a well-known example) fifteen species only are described; while of the remaining family of the Skipper butterflies sixty-three species are described. Many of the species in each of the groups above mentioned are new to science, notwithstanding the recent exertions of Wallengren, Felder, and others. We cannot too highly praise the very careful manner in which these species have been described throughout the work, while the extensive and careful lists of localities given under each at once show its geographical range, often extending from South Africa (Zululand, Delagoa Bay, and Natal, &c.) to the Western Coast (Angola), the Camaroons, Cape Coast Castle, Sierra Leone, and Senegal, and to the Zambesi and Zanzibar districts—a wide range which is not confined to butterflies, but also to beetles and other tribes of insects not endowed with equally strong powers of flight. The plates contain about thirty figures of new species, more than half being representations of obscure Skipper butterflies, which require careful delineation for the sake of identification.

Some of the species described exhibit interesting resemblances to other butterflies of quite distinct families, a kind of relationship which it has lately been the fashion to term mimicry, an unfortunate name, giving the idea that the insects, of their own accord, assumed the appearance of other quite distinct species.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ARE THERE ANY TRACES OF BABYLONIAN OR ASSYRIAN NAMES IN PĀLI LITERATURE?

Dedham, Essex.

There is, in the Jātaka-book iii., p. 126, a story entitled Bāveru-jātika where mention is made of a Bāveru territory or kingdom. The late Prof. Minayeff identified Bāveru with Babila or Babylon. No other attempt has been made to find traces of Babylonian or Assyrian names in the Pāli scriptures. Their identification is not an easy matter, owing to the great change such foreign names would undergo in the speech or writings of an Aryan people. We may, I think, see another Babylonian name in Seruma or Soruma (Sussondi-jātika iii., p. 187), which looks like a corruption of Shumir, the ancient designation of Southern Chaldea. The form Seruma might spring from an original Sumira, through the intermediate stages of Simura, Semura. The other (Siñhalese) reading Soruma would come from Sumira through Somira, Somura. But Seruma may, after all, be a syncopated form of the Sanskrit Ka-serumant, one of the nine divisions of Bhāratavarsa, but quite distinct from Nāgadvīpa. It would seem as easy a matter to have turned Shumir into Sumira or Sumera, as Babila into Bāveru, without any further change; but, perhaps, Seruma is due to an endeavour to differentiate it from Su-meru, Sineru, Mount Meru.

In Jāt. i. p. 111, we find Seriva as the name of a country. Bearing in mind the interchange of v and m, we may have here another form of Seruma.

From the Sussondi-jātika we learn that Serumadipa was the older name of Nāgadipa, which, according to Buddhist authorities, denotes an island near Ceylon; but there was a more ancient Nāgadipa, which may not have been the name of any part of Ceylon. In making Serumadipa equivalent to Nāgadipa there was probably an attempt of the later prose writer to explain the uncommon appellation Seruma, which he found in the older gāthā, but did not know quite what to make of.

The proper names in the Sussondi-jātaka have a strange and foreign appearance. The ruler of Benares is called Tambarājā or "Copper-King"; and his wife bears the curious designation of Sussondi, which some of the old scribes have tried to render more significant by turning it into Sussoni, Sayonandi, Suyonandi. We find, too, that in this story the Bodhisat is represented as having been reborn as a supanna, a fabulous winged creature, a vulture-like bird, but here said (as in Kākātī-jātaka iii., p. 91) to have been able to take the human form. In fact, these two Jātaka stories show that the supanna was "a winged man." But Buddha (so far as we can gather from the history of his many previous births) is never represented as having been reborn either as a supanna or a winged-man. Did the Hindus get their notions of a fabulous supanna from the Dravidians or non-Aryans, and they again from the Babylonians, who had all sorts of winged creatures in their mythology? The Vedas, we believe, do not use supanna to designate a fabulous bird, but it occurs later on in the Laws of Manu.

The Copper-king has a musician* called Sagga, a most extraordinary name for a man, which has not been met with elsewhere. No one would assume the title of Sagga (= Svarga, "heaven") any more than he would that of Inda or Sakka. It may, perhaps, be a corruption of a non-Aryan Sarg or Sargi.

The Kākātī-jātaka III., p. 91, has "katham patari Kebukam" for "katham adakkhi Serumam" in Jāt. iii., p. 189. The commentary explains Kebuka as the name of a river, and makes the Simbali-rukha (silk-cotton tree) to be the abode of the Supannas. Simbali answers to the Sanskrit Çālnālī, one of the seven dvīpas, wherein silk-cotton trees abounded, while Çālmalin is a name of Garuda.

In the Sussondi-jātaka the king's musician is represented as starting from Īharukaccha for Nāgadīpā, but is shipwrecked, and gets to the place on a raft.

In the Kākātī-jātaka he arrives at the abode of the supannas by getting on to the end of the monster's wing; but seven oceans had to be crossed before he reached his destination. The seven oceans, corresponding to the seven continents, are, we suppose, those mentioned in the Purānas. The Çālmāladvīpa, outside Plakṣadvīpa, was said to be surrounded by a sea of wine. There was a Simbali-lake on Mount Meru, round which dwelt the supannas in a forest of Simbali-trees (see Jāt. i., pp. 202-3; iv., p. 257; and Childers s.v. Simbali). In Dhammapada, p. 194, = Jāt. i., p. 202-3, supannas are called garulas; and Garuda, the bird of Vishnu, is represented in Hindu mythology as king of the Supannas.

According to Purānic accounts, Meru is in the centre of Jambudvīpa, and cannot, therefore, be the same locality as Nāgadīpā or Seruma.

There appears to be in the Buddhist traditions a mixing up (1) of Supannas and Gandhabbas, and (2) of two kinds of mythical winged creatures. Perhaps those better versed in Sanskrit literature than the writer of these notes may be able to throw some light upon the subject. There is also, perhaps, a confusion of real with mythical names in regard to Seruma, Kebuka, &c.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

IN connexion with the scheme for holding the ninth International Congress of Orientalists in London in September, 1891, it is proposed to deliver a series of lectures in London during the present winter. This series will be begun by Prof. Carl Abel, who hopes to lecture on Wednesday and Saturday next, at the German Athenaeum, 93, Mortimer Street, Regent Street, upon "Indo-Egyptian Affinities" and "The Psychology of Language." In November Dr. Glaser proposes to come to London before starting on a second tour of archaeological exploration in Arabia, and will give an account of his past discoveries and of his future plans. Later on Dr. Leitner will report on his linguistic and ethnographical discoveries in the Hindukush.

THE second edition of Prof. Strong's translation of Paul's Principles of the History of Language, which Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein are just about to issue, will contain, besides a general revision of the whole, a number of additional examples and illustrations, mostly drawn from the English language. It is hoped that this will render the book more interesting to English and American readers. Translations have been made of the more difficult passages from Old and Middle High German. References have been verified, and in most cases have their origin noted in the margin, while a new index has been compiled by Mr. T. Case.

THE October number of the Classical Review (David Nutt) is learned rather than interesting. The reviews are as thorough as usual, but they do not happen to deal with books of the first importance. Questions of comparative philology are conspicuous by their absence, and textual criticism occupies the first place. Dr. P. Schwencke contributes the first instalment of an elaborate apparatus criticus on the "De Natura Deorum" of Cicero, in correction of the work of Baiter, and Dr. J. Gow similarly contests the classification of the MSS. of Horace adopted by Keller and Holder. Mr. W. M. Lindsay writes upon some peculiarities in a MS. of Nonius which he collated in the Escorial, and Prof. Lewis Campbell corrects a series of passages in a MS. at Paris of Plato's "Republic," which seem to have been misread by Baiter. Finally, Mr. Cecil Smith reports that the British Museum has now completed the purchase of the Castle Howard collection of gems.

MR. ARCHER HIND'S "Timaeus" is reviewed by Mr. Ingram Bywater in the Archiv Für Geschichte der Philosophie (iii., 4). He points out grave shortcomings in the critical notes on the text, and allows the reader to see that he has a decided opinion on the quality of the scholarship, evidenced by the translation and commentary. "There are indeed," he says, "a great many passages in the Dialogue in which the editor seems to have mistaken the plain meaning of the Greek." Amusing illustrations are given. The review ends with a few pointed remarks on Mr. Archer Hind's indebtedness to Stallbaum and others, and on the attitude which he observes toward Stallbaum.

RECENT numbers of the Berliner Philologische Wochenschrift contain notices of Canon Taylor's "Origin of the Aryans," by Prof. Justi; of Dr. Head's "Coins of Corinth," by Dr. Weil; and of Prof. Nettleship's "Latin Lexicography," by Prof. Götz. All these books are favourably noticed.

FINE ART.

BURMESE COINS AND CURRENCY.

II.

Simla : September 4, 1890.

KING MINDON introduced a coinage about 1861, though he antedated many coins to 1852, the year of his accession. The only other coin I know of before that date is the "fish" coin of 1781 already alluded to. It has on the obverse two fishes and on the reverse 1143 Tabōdwē labyijaw 14 yet, that is, "the 14th of Tabōdwē waning, 1143 (Burmese era)" or February, 1781. This must have been struck in the year of the succession of King Bōdawphayā, who founded Amarapura, and is locally known in Mandalay as King Shwēbō. Commenting on the only known specimen in his time, Phayre (International Numismata Orientalia, vol. iii., part i., p. 33, and plate v. 8) says that it was probably a medal struck by a queen of Ava who came from Myanaung on the Irrawaddy in Lower Burma, to be placed in a pagoda she intended to build at Myanaung. This he conjectured because the coin was found at Myanaung; but I have two specimens from the Mandalay bazaars, both tendered in payment of fees. They are locally known as coins of King Shwēbō, so I think the most likely guess about them is that they are a genuine issue of Bōdawphayā. Amarapura, his capital, is contiguous to Mandalay. In the Calcutta Museum are two extremely interesting specimens of the pagoda medals of Bōdawphayā, as they are the identical samples that Hiram Cox brought to Calcutta at his request in order to have copies made of them at the mint, to be placed in the now historic pagoda he was building at Mingūn, opposite Mandalay. They were given as "ancient" specimens, and it is well to note here that they were cast, not struck. The modern Burman is, however, an adept at both metal casting and die-sinking.

King Mindon coined in gold, silver, copper, brass, and iron. There were four gold coins:

(1) Shwē-ngāmūzī, or gold five-mū-piece, that is, a gold half-rupee, as 10 mū=R.1. It corresponds to the gold mohar of India; and I may note that to the Burman the English sovereign, the French louis or napoleon, and similar coins, are all shwē-ngāmūzīs. It is extremely rare. My specimen is the only one I have ever seen, but others I know exist. King Mindon intended to throw them into circulation largely, and had the dies cut and a certain number struck off; but he died shortly afterwards, and King Thibaw did nothing in the matter. Obv.: a tō or mythological lion and tō tazēktaw 1240 (royal stamp of the lion, 1878 A.D.). Rev.: a wreath, outside the wreath Yedanābōn nēbyīdaw (the royal residence, Ratanābhūmi=Mandalay), and within the wreath 5 mū thōng dīngā (coin for use as 5 mū).

(2) Shwē-tamatsī, gold one-quarter piece—i.e., the half mohar. It is still common. Obv.: a chinthē or mythological lion, and chinthē tazēktaw 1228 (royal stamp of the lion, 1866 A.D.). Rev.: a wreath, Yedanābōn nēbyīdaw and 2 mū 1 pē thōng dīngā (coin for use as 2½ mū). Two pē = one mū.

(3) Shwē-mūzī, gold mū piece. This is not common. Obv.: a peacock and tazēktaw (royal stamp). Rev.: a wreath, Yedanābōn nēbyīdaw and 1 mū thōng 1214 (for use as 1 mū, 1852 A.D.). The date is a false one, as above explained.

(4) Shwē-pēzī, gold pē piece. Two varieties, neither of which is common. Firstly—obv.: same as the shwē-tamatsī; rev.: 1 pē thōng dīngā (coin for use as 1 pē) and Yedanābōn nēbyīdaw. Secondly—obv.: same as the shwē-mūzī; rev.: 1 pē thōng 1214.

The silver coins were R. 1, R. ½, R. ¼, R. ⅛, and R. ⅙; but in practice they were current as R. 1,

* In this Jātaka, gandhabba does not mean a heavenly musician or Gandharva; it has also the meaning of music (see Jāt. iii., pp. 188, ll. 19-21; Childers, s.v. Gandhabba).

8 as., 4 as., 2 as., and 1 anna. They all had the same device. Obv.: a peacock with tazéktaw. Rev.: a wreath, outside it Yedanábôn nēbyīdaw, and inside it the value and the same date in each case, 1214 = A.D. 1852. The values were stated thus:—1 kyat thōng dīngā, coin to be used as R. 1; 5 mū thōng, to be used as 5 mū = R.  $\frac{1}{5}$ ; 1 mat thōng, to be used as one-quarter = R.  $\frac{1}{4}$ ; 1 mū thōng, to be used as 1 mū = R.  $\frac{1}{10}$ ; 1 pē thōng to be used as 1 pē = R.  $\frac{1}{20}$ . All these coins are common, but being now thrown out of currency will soon become rare, especially those of the lower values. Incorrectly struck coins, through careless minting, were also common. I have several specimens.

There is a doubt, to be cleared up only by reference to the Calcutta mint record, as to whether King Mindōn got his dies from Calcutta, London, or Paris. But in the Indian Museum at Calcutta is a collection of the local mint issues; and among them are splendid specimens of these coins, evidently mint samples. This I think settles the question provisionally.

In copper only pice were struck in two varieties: one with the peacock and one with the mythological lion (tō). The former were never common, and except perhaps in the villages both have ceased to be so by this time. The effect of their withdrawal from currency in 1889 seemed to drive them out of the Mandalay bazaars within a week. The first had obv.: a peacock and udaung tazéktaw 1227 (the royal stamp of the peacock, 1865 A.D.); rev.: a wreath, and inside it Yedanábôn nēbyīdaw—1 pē thōng dīngā 4 bôn tabôn (Ratanābhūmi, the royal residence—coin to be used as a pice, 4th part of 1 pē). After the word dīngā is an abbreviation  $\delta$  which I do not know, but conjecture to stand for paisā (= pice), an imported word well understood in Burma.

The second has—obv.: a tō and tō tazéktaw (royal stamp of the lion). Rev.: a wreath, outside it Yedanábôn nēbyīdaw, and inside 1 mū thōng dīngā pôn tabôn 1240 (coin to be used as an 8th part of 1 mū A.D. 1878). The eighth of a mū = the fourth of a pē. It is possible that King Thibaw on his accession in October, 1878, initiated this coinage; but I cannot find that he originated anything in gold or silver.

The brass coinage is very interesting. I have two specimens evidently struck from the dies used for the tō copper coins just described. I am told that it originated thus. The Burmese imported their copper in sheets for coining; and being unable to roll copper, which requires costly machinery capable of enduring great heat, they mixed zinc with the waste copper resulting from punching the sheets, and then rolled it. The brass coinage resulting was forced into currency. Specimens used to be common showing zinc alloy in various quantities.

The iron coinage of King Mindōn was in circulation for a very short time. The two specimens I have are the only ones I have seen. So far as their condition will permit one to learn, they seem to have been struck from the dies used for the peacock copper coins. I am told they passed for one pie or one-third of a pice.

Lead coins were at the time of the occupation of Upper Burma common enough, but they have now disappeared. Those I have are all I have seen, and it may be that they are all that are now to be got, excepting a few that I gave away. King Thibaw was the monarch that was guilty of the enormity of coining in lead. His lead coins were of three kinds.

(1) Obv.: a hare, remains of tazéktaw and clearly 1241 or A.D. 1879? Rev.: blank, and obviously always so. This is the only specimen I have ever seen. The hare as representing the moon, and the peacock as representing the sun, are the crests of the Alompra (Alaung phayā) dynasty, which claimed (a mythological) descent from both the lunar and solar lines of India. Its value was probably one-fourth paisā (pice).

(2) Obv.: a hare, and yōn tazéktaw 1241 (royal stamp of the hare, A.D. 1879). Rev.: Kyēnī dīngā 4 bôn tabôn (lead coin, 4th part of a pice), if we are to take a symbol  $\delta$  after dīngā to mean a pice. The words are inside a wreath.

(3) Obv.: the same as the preceding. Rev.: Kyēnī dīngā 8 pôn tabôn (8th part of a pice). The symbol  $\delta$  again occurs after dīngā.

I must now go back to consider the coins stamped to mark exchange-value only, which form the link above alluded to between coin and coin of the realm.

First in this category come copper discs made in the royal mint but never stamped. Either through carelessness or theft these discs got into circulation in large quantities, and owing to Burmese habits were freely used as tokens of the full value of the regular coins.

As unquestioned coins that were acknowledged to be not coin of the realm, but still had a ready currency at about 75 per cent. of the royal mint currency, were the taungbannī coins. They were in silver, copper, and brass, and all copied the issues from the royal mint. I have never been able to satisfactorily account for the minting of this taungbannī currency. Every one in Mandalay of any importance, or likely to really know, always for some reason denied all knowledge of their origin. I suspect that private persons, either for a consideration or with the connivance of the mint-master, obtained a right to issue coins, or that downright illicit coining was common. Some Burmans called the taungbannī currency phōnggī money, and asserted that certain monasteries coined as of right. Others said that they were issued by great personages.

I have two silver taungbannī pieces, both of one mū. One is much larger than the other, and, I fancy, was meant to do duty as a tamat piece=2  $\frac{1}{2}$  mū. Both are meant to bear the legend on the true 1 mū piece and the date 1214 = 1852 A.D. Similarly my copper specimens are copies of the tō copper coins, and bear date 1240 = 1878 A.D. The brass taungbannī coinage, of which I have several pieces, was common. All are copies of the tō copper coins, and all bear date 1240.

I must now pass on to forgeries and other matters, which I reserve for another letter.

R. C. TEMPLE.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE committee of the Egypt Exploration Fund have under consideration a scheme—for which they hope to obtain the sanction of the Egyptian government—of sending out two gentlemen, fully qualified as archaeologists and surveyors, whose duty it will be to map, plan, photograph, and copy all the most important sites, sculptures, paintings, and inscriptions yet extant, so as to preserve at least a faithful record of these fast-perishing monuments.

THE exhibitions to open next week are the Pastels at the Grosvenor Gallery—which is understood to be the last exhibition that will be held there; a second series of drawings and sketches of birds by Mr. H. Stacy-Marks, at the Fine Art Society's; and Messrs. Hollender & Cremetti's annual winter exhibition at the Hanover Gallery. We may also mention that there is now on view in Cockspur-street a collection of 160 pictures in oil illustrating Rabelais, painted by the late Jules Garnier.

THE first edition of London Street Arabs, by Mrs. H. M. Stanley (Dorothy Tennant), has been already exhausted, and a second edition will be ready next week.

THE first general meeting of the Hellenic Society for the current session will be held at 22 Albemarle-street on Monday next, October 20, at 5 p.m., Prof. Jebb, president, in the chair. Mr. A. H. Smith will read a paper on "A Drum of a Column from Ephesus," and Mr. Theodore Bent will describe his recent researches in Cilicia.

THE government has signified its intention of making a grant of £1000 a year for five years for the purchase of pictures for the National Gallery of Scotland.

THE last number of the Revue Archéologique contains a favourable notice of Mr. F. Haverfield's "Romano-British Inscriptions," recently published in the Ephemeris Epigraphica. The reviewer is M. Cagnat, professor of epigraphy at Paris. We believe that M. Cagnat himself is assisting in the preparation of a new volume of the Corpus.

MR. G. AITCHISON, professor of architecture in the Royal Academy, has chosen "Byzantine Architecture" as the subject of his course this winter. The lectures will be delivered on Mondays and Thursdays, beginning on January 26.

WE quote the following from Le Bosphore égyptien (Cairo) of October 1:

"Il se passe aux Pyramides un fait scandaleux, incroyable, inouï: Trois escouades d'ouvriers sous la conduite de deux cheikhs, descendent les blocs qui forment les assises des deux grandes Pyramides, les brisent et les chargent sur de nombreux chameaux.

"L'administration délivre, dit-on, des permis pour prendre les blocs éparpillés; c'est déjà une grande faute, car c'est à ces permis qu'il faut attribuer les actes de vandalisme que nous signalons.

"Ces monuments qui sont les livres vivants des civilisations disparues, ont résisté au temps et ils s'effriteraient aujourd'hui sous la pioche stupide de manoeuvres munis d'une autorisation de l'administration! On a beau dire que les permis ne visent que les blocs isolés, c'est l'administration qui est coupable, puis-qu'elle seule doit s'assurer qu'on n'abuse pas des permis qu'elle donne; et si un simple reporter ne nous apprenait ce qui se passe, il est probable que cette belle administration ne s'en serait jamais douté. Au surplus, n'y a-t-il pas un scheikh gardien des Pyramides et appointé par l'Etat?

"Si oui, qu'on le chasse, car il ne fait pas son devoir; ce ne peut être en effet que grâce à sa complicité que les deux cheikhs dont nous avons parlé peuvent se livrer à un commerce qui, au fond, ne doit pas les enrichir."

THE STAGE.

"RAVENSWOOD" AT THE LYCEUM.

THE heartiest admirers of Mr. Irving's acting—and I may reckon myself one of these—will surely not find in Edgar of Ravenswood a part that displays him, that permits him to sound, so to say, every note of his compass, as Hamlet does, as Mathias does, as Louis Onze does, and Richelieu. The persons charmed most readily by Miss Ellen Terry's real gifts and graces—the gifts and graces generally of an actress of pathos and poetic comedy—may not discover in the part of Lucy Ashton quite the opportunities afforded by Ophelia, or by the Oliver of "The Vicar of Wakefield," or by the deserted lady in "Masks and Faces." The sworn believers in Sir Walter Scott—the people satisfied most easily or stirred the most enthusiastically by the accepted "master of pageantry and of external romance," as I have elsewhere dared to call him in contrasting him with Balzac—will find, to their annoyance, that Mr. Hermann Merivale, in this new version of The Bride of Lammermoor, has departed very much from Scott's own version of "the ower true tale." Yet for all these things, the new piece at the Lyceum is, upon the whole, a substantial and worthy success—a success for the author, a success for the actors, a success for scene-painter, for costumier, for stage-manager, and for whoever inspired these; and a success, moreover, for the distinguished composer who has furnished the play with music eminently characteristic and suitable in all that it affords of weirdness and romance. Mr. Hermann Merivale, Mr. Irving, Miss Terry, Mr. Mackintosh, Mr. Howe, Mr. Terriss, Mr. Hawes Craven, and Dr. A. C. Mackenzie—there is not one of them but has contributed his large and weighty stone to the edifice of dignity that has now been reared.

Let us begin with Mr. Merivale. His present work, though quite new to the public, dates, it is said, from ten years back. One is sorry not to have had the opportunity of reading it; for, as line by line is uttered, one feels that it is literature and not stage patchwork—one feels that it is a thing directly inspired by its subject; terse, vigorous, poetic—that is, genuinely eloquent. Heavens! what a contrast to the pretentious, imitative nonsense, or wearisome commonplace, which, because it has been measured with accuracy, or because it avoids the realism of prose, we have been asked, over and over again at the theatre, to accept as poetry. Mr. Merivale is not a poseur—a mere stage-post, insignificant and feeble at the heart of him and wrapping himself ineffectually in robes of state. I insist on this very much, just because, even with its great traditions and its noble precedents, the theatre is somehow the place in which, in poetry, the distinction between the genuine and the false is least of all understood. Actors—sensible chiefly of that which will produce its effect with the groundling, or (for I will not exaggerate at all) sensible chiefly of telling situation rather than of subtlety of thought, very indulgent of the grandiloquent and empty phrase, and of the expression stately ornate—are, as a rule, about the worse judges of actual literature whom one could find anywhere among the decently educated. As a rule, it is not literature, but the showy imitation of it, that appeals to the actor. That is what he believes in—not so much, indeed, in comedy as in the writing that attempts to be poetry. And so, I suppose, the average actor has a respect for Mr. Hermann Merivale very much less than the respect that author inspires in his own brethren, who understand that his merits are absolutely sterling and that his claims to the gifts of imagination and of style cannot be disallowed.

To consider, in a little more of detail, Mr. Merivale's treatment of his present theme. For the purposes of the stage it has been quite essential that he should change certain of the incidents in The Bride of Lammermoor—that he should modify and recreate, as well as simply suppress; but, if he has often altered the scene, he has not, I think, destroyed or in any way marred seriously the presentation of the characters. Edgar and Lucy, Sir William Ashton and his domineering and determined wife, and, to name one other, at least Caleb Balderstone, remain in the poetic play for the most part what we find them in the poetic romance—in the romance in which Sir Walter, least of all (let us joyfully concede it), rested content with surface and with pageant, with antiquarianism and with history—the romance in which (for it is at once his "Hamlet" and his "Romeo and Juliet") he was possibly most philosophical and certainly most passionate. Strange that from the really greatest of his critics, because he was at bottom the greatest of his brethren, Sir Walter should have received no mention of this weird and poetic creation! Strange—but it was surely a mere accident—that Balzac should have withheld from The Bride of Lammermoor the praise never denied by him to Ivanhoe, to Kenilworth, and to The Antiquary!

The best is said, and said briefly, for the actors who take part in this production, when it is averred that without conspicuous effort at personal display they throw themselves successfully—with hardly an exception—into the characters they are invited to assume. Mr. Irving's company—putting aside, for the moment, the two distinguished heads of it—has been gradually getting stronger. In some of the earlier of his productions Mr. Irving and Miss Terry were insufficiently supported. This has ceased to be the case; and with regard to at least the secondary, if not quite so truly of the third rank characters to be impersonated in "Ravenswood," it may be said that upon our present stage more effectual interpretation it would be impossible to secure. Mr. Mackintosh is simply the very best Caleb Balderstone whom I expect at any time to see. In build, in gesture, and in voice, in silence as much as in speech, by "being" as much as by "doing," he expresses the quaintness, the devotion, the simplicity, and yet the boastfulness, and yet the "canniness" of a retainer who served Edgar as Adam served Orlando. The reticence of Mr. Alfred Bishop tells well as Sir William Ashton, especially when thereto is added a certain wily persuasiveness. Hayston of Bucklaw is represented handsomely by Mr. Terriss, and Lord Athole (he was more or less anonymous in Sir Walter as "the Marquis of A.") by Mr. Macklin. The voice of Mr. Howe, with its robust comfort and venerable admonition, is heard and welcomed in Bide-the-Bent. And Miss Le Thiere, happily unsympathetic, looks everything that Lady Ashton ought to look. Against Edgar, as a part for Mr. Irving, all I think that can be said is to utter the not very reasonable complaint that its opportunities are not unlimited. What there are Mr. Irving uses with unflinching skill. His appearance is picturesque and "fateful"; gallant, too, and impetuous; and each change of mind that comes over the Master of Ravenswood—whether the changes be towards love or vengeance, tenderness or despair—is indicated with certainty, and very often with subtlety and lightness of touch. Whatever may have been the fascinations of Mr. Fechter, I wish for no better Edgar than the present one.

And, to my own mind, the grip which Miss

Ellen Terry obtains upon every situation, every feeling that can have been Lucy Ashton's, is almost firmer and more thorough than I have ever before noticed. Olivia, in its agreeable yet more limited range, in its demand upon this most sympathetic actress of nothing whatever but that which she is clearly and at all times able to give, must remain, I suppose—or may remain, at all events—the most universally acceptable of her performances. Yet, among any just ordering of Miss Terry's successes, the part of Lucy Ashton must take very high rank. The performance presents nothing that is violently debateable; there is here no "view" of a character with which one may be permitted or provoked to quarrel. The character is simple—when was there ever subtlety in a heroine of Sir Walter's?—but it is charming and natural, so far as it goes, and, by the incidents of the story, it is exposed to many adventures; it has some knowledge of filial affection, and it sounds the depths of love. The ground which, as she traverses the life of Lucy Ashton, Miss Terry covers is wider, and is covered more completely, than many of us would have expected. From the first phases of the good, gay girl, quite fancy-free, to those of the enamoured woman, and on again to those of the disappointed and despairing, the wholly listless and heartsick, there is nothing that Miss Terry does that is not justified and that is not adequate. In the last act, when the Lord of Ravenswood bursts in upon Lucy as she has signed the contract of marriage which her mother has demanded of her, the actress rises very fully, and with a step entirely refined and certain, to those tragic heights which, I confess for my own part, I was a little sceptical of her scaling.

The Lyceum management has seldom, if ever, set itself a worthier task, and seldom, if ever, one which it has fulfilled with a more genuine success, than in the production of the play which a most excellent writer of to-day has founded upon one of those romances of "the wizard" which are most likely to be of permanent fascination—a romance in which the wizardry and magnetism are most evident and are likely to be most lasting.

STAGE NOTES.

WE are glad to observe, from the notices of the Criterion, that Mrs. Bernard Beere has recovered from her long illness, and has been able to reappear in "Still Waters Run Deep."

At the Shaftesbury Theatre Miss Wallis has produced Mr. Robert Buchanan's "The Sixth Commandment" with a very strong cast, including the manageress, who plays with effect; Miss Elizabeth Robins, who is admittedly very successful indeed in parts in which there is a demand for genuine pathos; Miss Marion Lea, whose emotional successes are not to be forgotten because she took the town as Audrey and has a real skill in comedy; M. Marius, a little uncertain perhaps of what is expected of him in his present effort; and such excellent and always serviceable artists as William Herbert, Herbert Waring, Ivan Watson, and Lewis Waller. Whether this strong cast ensures success for the production yet remains, perhaps, to be seen.

MR. W. H. DAVENPORT ADAMS read the other day before the Playgoers' Club a paper called "Recollections and Reflections," which summed up concisely, and yet vividly, his experiences of twenty years of professional playgoing. Mr. Davenport Adams did an interesting service in making many London playgoers aware of the very various dramatic achievements of certain popular favourites whose very success in London has narrowed the scope of their performances. For Mr. Davenport Adams's earliest playgoing days were spent in the provinces; and at Glasgow especially he had the opportunity of seeing many of the celebrities of this moment performing parts with which no one would think of associating them. Apart from his numerous reminiscences, the lecturer did further service in recalling to the minds of his audience the now constantly forgotten fact of the theatre's real position as one of the fine arts. Some of its professors, and some, too, of its critics, are a little too fond of posing as if Providence had established the theatre to be the chosen handmaid of the English Church, or now-a-days, perhaps, her equal. There are some of us for whom it would appear that the theatre speaks as one having authority—as one having cure of souls. Mr. Davenport Adams gently, but firmly, sat upon this notion, claiming for the theatre, as its chief function, that it should entertain—it being of course understood that in entertaining it must entertain with refinement.

MUSIC.

THE NORWICH FESTIVAL.

Norwich, October 14, 1890.

THE twenty-third triennial festival, which commenced here to-day, forms, in one respect, a marked contrast to the festival of 1887. The foreign element was then conspicuous; now it is conspicuous by its absence. A novelty should, of course, be judged on its own merits, and not according to the name or nationality of the composer; but, unless there be some special reason to the contrary, it does seem right that at an English festival English composers should have prior claim. When a Spohr, a Mendelssohn, a Gounod, or a Dvorák presents himself he is a fitting and welcome guest; but men like Sir A. Sullivan or Drs. Mackenzie and Parry are more fitting and more welcome than the Italian visitors of 1887, who, as composers, had no past to boast of, and whose success was doubtful.

The scheme of this year's festival is interesting, if not startling, and the selection of works shows judgment and discretion. Sir A. Sullivan is represented by his sacred musical drama, "The Martyr of Antioch," produced at Leeds in 1880; Dr. Mackenzie by his "Dream of Jubal," and the Incidental Music to "The Bride of Lammermoor," recently written for the Lyceum Theatre; while Dr. Parry contributes a novelty. Besides, the two young and talented composers, Mr. Hamish MacCunn and Mr. Edward German, each conduct one of their works. "Elijah" is to be given, but not the time-honoured "Messiah." The absence of this oratorio is not, however, to be regretted. At each gathering the attendance showed signs of decrease; and, besides, the glory of this oratorio has hitherto cast into the shade many works of Handel of as great, if not greater, importance. One of these is certainly "Judas Maccabæus," chosen for the opening performance this evening. Both in the solo and choral music the Saxon master here displays himself in all his beauty and strength. The simple grandeur of "O Father, whose almighty power," is refreshing, if only as a contrast to the highly-wrought music of our day; the concluding chorus of the first part, "Hear us, O Lord," has wonderful dramatic power; while the "We never will bow down," is a piece of writing which seems to defy the destroying hand of time.

Mme. Nordica and Miss Liza Lehmann were both successful, although it must be said that their rendering of the airs allotted to them was at times not altogether Handelian. Mr. Alec Marsh seemed out of his element in this oratorio music; his intonation was uncertain, and his voice has not improved since he sang here at the last festival. Mr. Lloyd was in splendid voice. It is indeed a pity that such an artist should alter Handel to make display of his high notes. If the great singers do things of this kind, it seems hopeless to expect rising vocalists to show proper respect for composers. Mr. Lloyd was not the only one of the cast who was in fault in this respect, but we single him out as he can so well afford to set a good example. Miss Marian Mackenzie did justice to her part, her rendering of the air, "Father of Heaven," being exceedingly good. Mr. Maldwyn Humphreys made the most of his small part.

The chorus is much better than in 1887. The basses in quality of tone come first, and next to them the sopranos. The voices of the latter are bright, but the tone on the high notes is somewhat shrill. The tenors must be ranked last.

The singing in the oratorio was on the whole excellent as compared with last festival; there is much more precision and vigour. There is a good orchestra, with a capable leader in Mr. G. H. Betzemann, who this time takes the place of Mr. Carrodus. Mr. Randegger, the conductor, displays his usual care and energy.

October 15, 1890.

This (Wednesday) morning the programme commenced with the orchestral introduction to the second part of Spohr's "Last Judgment"; and this was followed by Heinrich Schutz's "Lamentatio Davidi," for bass voice, accompanied by four trombones and organ. The latter piece, by the famous old seventeenth-century master, is solemn and impressive, but a concert platform is scarcely the place for it; it needs the "antique pillars," the "storied windows," and the "dim religious light," of which Milton tells in his poem about to be mentioned. The bass part was carefully sung by Mr. F. Novara.

The chief feature of the programme was Dr. C. H. Parry's new cantata, "L'Allegro ed il Penseroso," composed expressly for the festival. Dr. Parry, in choosing Milton's words, set himself no easy task. There is so much music in the poet's lines that they can scarcely be said to yearn for more. But that Handel had already married immortal music to immortal verse added no little to the difficulty. This fact, of course, at once suggests comparison, but it will, we think, be generally acknowledged that Dr. Parry cannot be charged with having imitated his illustrious predecessor. One may feel inclined to describe some of the music as Handelian, but this arises chiefly from its simple and diatonic character. With this, however, is mixed a strong modern element—the orchestra, with its independent treatment and its chromatic colouring. The mixture of the two styles may not be altogether satisfactory; but it is by no means unpleasant, and the composer is so skilled a workman that the general effect is certainly not patchy.

Mr. Charles Jennens, Handel's librettist, showed scant respect for the poet; lines from "L'Allegro," alternated with others from "Il Penseroso," while an addition was made bearing the title "Il Moderato." Dr. Parry has taken the two poems in their proper order, merely omitting certain lines. His work only takes three quarters of an hour in performance, and this in itself is a great merit. Nowhere are the movements unduly spun out, nowhere does one feel that the words are mere pegs for the music.

The orchestral introduction contains various themes which are afterwards heard. The opening one, for instance, is not introduced until fifty-four out of seventy-five pages (vocal score) have been given. And with this, as well as with the other themes, there is no attempt at the so-called Wagnerian method. When composers have the courage to try their hand at it, they deserve praise; but when they refrain from it, no fault can be found with them. The opening soprano solo—"Hence, loathed Melancholy," contains some picturesque writing and effective contrasts. The "Haste thee, nymph," which follows without break, is a bright, pleasing, and clever number: the song of the lark, the cock "with lively din," and the sounds of "hound and horn," are imitated, but with due moderation. The soprano solo, "Sometime walking," has a real Old-English flavour, and the accompaniment displays choice harmonies and pleasing rhythm. In the next chorus there are some striking passages; the "poco piu tranquillo" section is particularly happy. There is one charming phrase in the orchestra here which strongly recalls Wagner. A short orchestral symphony leads without break to the "Penseroso" division, and here the solo part is assigned to a baritone voice. The opening "Andante" is not particularly impressive, but the stately "piu mosso" section for solo and chorus is full of character. The bass solo, "Oft on a plat of rising ground" is, to our thinking, one of the composer's most successful efforts. The concluding chorus is another number we would single out for special mention: it brings the work to a most effective climax. Of the performance we must speak briefly. The solo vocalists were Miss Macintyre and Mr. Alec Marsh. Both sang well, and the latter was heard to far better advantage than on the previous evening. The chorus sang with immense spirit; and Dr. Parry was received with special enthusiasm when he first came on the platform, and again at the close of the performance given under his direction.

Rossini's "Stabat Mater" was down for the second part of the programme. Mme. Nordica was in fine voice, and Mr. Lloyd sang his best. Miss Damian deserves special praise for her careful and quiet rendering of "Fac ut portem." Mr. A. Marsh was not over successful in the "Pro peccatis"; and Mr. Novara's low notes lacked tone, while in some of the ensemble music his voice was unduly prominent. The chorus sang well. Mr. Randegger conducted.

We must reserve our notice of the remainder of the festival until next week. We can only mention that the "Ravenswood" music was given under Dr. Mackenzie's direction this evening, and with brilliant success.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

MUSIC NOTE.

THE Crystal Palace concerts recommenced last Saturday. A Concerto in A minor for 'cello and orchestra (Op. 34) was given under the direction of the composer, Herr Hans Silt. The music is well written and pleasing; by metamorphosis of themes a sense of unity is imparted to the three movements. Of these three the Andante is decidedly the best. The solo part was admirably interpreted by Herr J. Klengel. Composer and executant were recalled at the close of the performance. The programme included the "Italian" Symphony, and the rendering under Mr. Manns's direction was all that could be desired. Mme. Valleria was the vocalist.

There are 500 Bookstalls available for this purpose. Of the current periodicals, one only at a time is allowed to a Subscription under Five Guineas, and Subscriptions will not be accepted for the supply of Magazines and Reviews only.

3.—The Books are delivered at the Bookstalls, carriage free. A Subscriber may exchange once a day. The Clerk in charge will obtain from London any Work in the Library which a Subscriber may desire to have. NOVELS exchanged only in unbroken and complete Sets.

4.—London Subscribers transferring their Subscriptions to a Country Depot will be entitled only to the number of volumes which the Country terms assign to the amount they subscribe; similarly, Country Subscriptions transferred to Town become subject to the London regulations.

5.—Subscriptions may commence at any date, and are payable in advance at any of the Railway Bookstalls, or 186, Strand, London.

6.—Messrs. W. H. SMITH & SON beg to impress upon their Library Subscribers the fact that much disappointment and inconvenience would be avoided if they would, in all cases, give to the Clerk in charge a list comprising at least twice as many titles of works as they wish to exchange.

LITERATURE.

The Life of Henry David Thoreau. By H. S. Salt. (Bentley.)

Anti-Slavery and Reform Papers. By Henry David Thoreau. Selected and Edited by H. S. Salt. (Sonnenschein.)

EXCEPTING one small circle, Thoreau, during his lifetime, was a prophet without honour either in his own country or elsewhere. All that was generally known of him—and it was not much—seemed to show him to be a person of peculiar and impracticable ideas, and of unfriendly if not actually morose disposition. The notion was inaccurate enough, but those who held it were not without excuse. Connected with what has been termed the Transcendental Revival of New England were several queer apostles of individualism, but none on the surface more queer or underneath the surface more solid than the subject of the works now under review. He impressed his own small circle with the conviction that he was a man of genius, but it was not for some time after his death that he became known to the world at large. In 1862, when he died, it would have been easy to predict that he and his works would soon be forgotten.

It is now seen that the impression Thoreau made on his friends was the right one; and he was not well appreciated by the world outside, simply because he was not well known. A change has taken place. The voice which thirty years ago was crying in the wilderness is now listened to with respectful attention in the drawing-room, and, what is more important, in the study. It said to society—make straight your paths. The paths of society were crooked then and they are crooked still, while measures, far different from Thoreau's, intended to improve them, are in favour at present. Yet Thoreau is not unheeded; and, when the honest but mistaken attempt of Socialism to save society in the mass has proved to be ineffectual, Thoreau's appeal to the individual is likely to be better understood and approved.

Of Thoreau's critics a few have estimated him justly, while others of whom better things were to be expected have misapprehended him. Emerson recognised him early, and never faltered in his admiration. Emerson found it "a pleasure and a privilege to walk with him," and described him to Carlyle as "a noble, manly youth, full of melodies and inventions." Alcott's testimony was equally emphatic. Mr. Sanborn and Mr. Ellery Channing have written their reminiscences at length, while Mr. Blake has prefixed a few significant words to the volume called Early Spring in Massachusetts, which he edited. Hawthorne, a man not easy of access, made a friend of Thoreau. On the other hand, Mr. James Russell Lowell failed to admire him; for the reason, according to Emerson, that Mr. Lowell had a great deal of self-consciousness, and never forgave Thoreau for wounding it. Beyond this circle we have the enthusiastic estimate of Mr. H. A. Page, an essay which does not enlighten by Mr. Robert Louis Stevenson, miscellaneous magazine articles, and not much besides.

There is, therefore, ample room for Mr. Salt's biography, and it is timely. It is not a great critical study, nor is it such a revelation of the inner man as a discreet disciple could give. I should say Mr. Salt has been neither a profound student nor a disciple of Thoreau, but has considered him and learned what he knows about him mainly for the purposes of this biography. He has taken pains to make his work complete and accurate, and the mistakes are few and not important. He gives the details of Thoreau's career, describes his person, his habits, his work, and his opinions. He provides just the book on the subject that is needed at the present time. It enables the reader to know all about Thoreau, the necessary preliminary to knowing the man himself. I am glad this book is free from the slightly patronising tone that Mr. Salt adopted when he gave an account of James Thomson (B.V.); but who could patronise Thoreau, even in a book?

It does not detract from the merit of the work that Mr. Salt has little to tell that is new to persons who have already interested themselves in Thoreau. The sources of information which were open to him had been, for the most part, open to them. His communications with personal friends of Thoreau have enabled him in some cases to amplify certain incidents and characteristics; but Thoreau's best friend, Emerson, long since gave the pith of the subject in the biographical sketch which he prefixed to Thoreau's collected works. Elsewhere in H. A. Page's pleasant volume, or scattered up and down in magazines and books, or gathered together in disorder that rivals Teufelsdröckh's paper bags, by Mr. Ellery Channing and Mr. Sanborn, were fuller particulars. Lastly, there were Thoreau's writings to furnish the key to his actions and character. All these Mr. Salt has handled with patience and skill, producing now, for the first time, a clear, systematic story of Thoreau's remarkable career.

Mr. Ellery Channing—the poet, Thoreau's intimate friend—has named Thoreau a "poet-naturalist." It is a good name in its way, has a pleasant sound, and is likely to be used on that account. There is much to justify it; but it does not by any means cover the whole nature of the man, or even indicate his leading characteristic. Primarily, Thoreau was not a poet or a naturalist, or both in one; but a critic of society. White of Selborne was a poet-naturalist; or, coming to our own times, Richard Jefferies might be correctly described as such. But neither White of Selborne nor Richard Jefferies was a closer or more interested observer of nature than Thoreau, this, to them, was an end in itself, whereas to him nature always had a human aspect and relation. In the case of White, who was a clergyman, more than in that of Jefferies or of Thoreau, we might fairly expect to find the human application or "moral" to his observations. But it is not there. The habits of martens, rooks, and rats interested him as such, and not because of any analogy between them and human habits or any influence they might exercise over human interests. Much the same is true of Jefferies. But Thoreau declares that "nature must be viewed humanly to be viewed at all; that is, her scenes must be associated with human affections, such as are associated with one's native place, for instance. She is most significant to a lover. If I have no friend, what is nature to me? She ceases to be morally significant."

He comes "to the hill to see the sun go down, to recover sanity" by putting himself "in relation with nature." To him "nature is fair in proportion as the youth is pure." In the sky he discerns the symbol of his own infinity. "If we go solitary to streams and mountains," he says, "it is to meet man there, where he is more than ever man." He was a critic of society and student of mankind, who found the symbol of a purer society in the woods and fields.

Occasionally Thoreau preferred to give some direct and immediate application of his principles to a topic of the hour. This was notably the case in connexion with John Brown's arrest after his attack at Harper's Ferry. Thoreau's was the first voice publicly raised in behalf of the hero. Mr. Salt has done well to collect, in the volume of Anti-Slavery and Reform Papers, the several utterances of this description. That he should expressly choose these from all Thoreau's writings for separate publication, and yet maintain, as he does, in the Introductory Note, that "Thoreau considered the real business of his life" to be "the study of wild nature," is certainly curious. Thoreau was a social critic and reformer none the less because his method of reform was not by invoking mechanical contrivances but by example. His sojourn at Walden Pond was not for the purpose of studying "wild nature"; but for the purpose of protesting against chaotic society, and proving, first to himself and afterwards to others, how exceedingly simple human life might be. "I wished to live deliberately," he explained, "to front only the essential facts of life, and see if I could not learn what it had to teach, and not when I came to die discover that I had not lived." His experiment served to teach him that a man may use as simple a diet as the animals and yet retain health and strength. After leaving Walden he continued to live simply. For more than five years, during which he maintained himself by the labour of his hands, he found he could meet all the expenses of living by working for about six weeks in each year.

Such an arrangement harmonised well with Thoreau's peculiar notions about labour. He was no "skulker," as Mr. Stevenson has called him, but, on the contrary, an unusually energetic and hard-working man. But he believed that labour was sanctified only when it was in the direction of a man's life. It was valuable just so far as it contributed to develop the labourer. The incident of the pencil has been often quoted. He made one, so excellent that people said there was a fortune in it. But it had already yielded him all he desired. He would not do the same thing again and again, as though he were a machine. Having the education he did not want the commodity. Yet he was the last man to shirk labour by transferring it to others. He never accepted leisure or convenience on such terms as these, for in his opinion

"the student who secures his coveted leisure and retirement by systematically shirking any labour necessary to man, obtains but an ignoble and unprofitable leisure, defrauding himself of the experience which alone can make leisure fruitful."

He complained that because he walked in the woods for love of them he was in danger of being regarded as a loafer, while men who esteemed the forests only for their timber were considered to be industrious and enterprising citizens—"as if a town had no interest in its forests but to cut them down." Yet a time came when his family needed the labour of his hands for their support, and he was not found wanting. His purpose was neither to shirk labour nor to do it, for labour was not an end in itself. But he was thrifty, and would not waste life on anything that was useless. Herein he believed he served the Supreme Being best; and so when he was dying, and someone asked him, "Have you made your peace with God?" he was justified in replying that "he had never quarrelled with Him."

That, with all this, Thoreau was still a profoundly interested nature-lover is not to be disputed. Had he not been so he would have emphasised his protest against society in some other way than by retiring to the woods. The creatures of the woods and even the very trees were, in his eyes, his friends. He loved every season and every aspect. His senses were peculiarly acute, so in this way he was physically well adapted to the life he chose. If every sight and sound in nature yielded also a spiritual meaning to his mind, so much the greater was the gain. It made him a "poet-naturalist," and something more.

When the reader has learned all he can about Thoreau, if he wants to understand Thoreau himself he must turn to his writings. Of these probably the most interesting is Walden, which contains, in addition to a careful account of his experiment, much philosophical musing on men and things. He is, however, at his best in the journals which he wrote so diligently and from which Mr. H. G. O. Blake has published copious selections. These journals have none of the elaboration and not much of the bitterness to be found in the writings he prepared for publication. Yet such essays as "A Winter's Walk" and "Autumnal Tints" are marked by unvarying serenity and much poetic power. Thoreau may fairly be described as a poet, but he was not a singer. His verses stumble and halt. There is more of the tone and grace of poetry in some of his prose passages than in them.

Great as Thoreau really was, and admitting the natural independence of his character, there is yet a suggestion, here and there, of an affectation of eccentricity. He seemed to choose to like precisely what others disliked, and to dislike whatever they might favour. In conversation and writing he was overfond of paradox. There seems to have been a little acting "for effect." At any rate, his peculiarities were not wholly unconscious. The fault in his case was not serious; for, though it detracted a little from his qualities as a critic, it involved no insincerity. At the worst, he did not pretend to be what he was not, but only exaggerated his idiosyncrasies. A born protestant, he sometimes emphasised his protest with quaint and unnecessary gestures—that was all.

That Thoreau was a brusque and unfriendly man those who knew him little agree in affirming. But to his friends and to all who had any claim upon him, whether by virtue of domestic ties or of their need for help, he was tender and affectionate. His parents and sisters found in him "a household treasure; always on the spot with skilful eye and hand to raise the best melons, plant the orchard with choicest trees, and act as extempore mechanic; fond of the pets, his sister's flowers or sacred tabby."

He loved children, and, while grudging his time to older persons, would spend many a precious hour berrying in the woods with them. The hunted negroes had good cause to thank him, not only for public speech on their behalf, but for private aid. The hut at Walden sheltered more than one fugitive from slavery. Birds and beasts, also, knew he was their friend. He did not wrong them, perhaps because he was a poet as well as a naturalist, but more likely because he felt a kinship with all living things. It is good to consider the wise teaching of this free and independent thinker and to study his methods; but the man himself, with all his sterling qualities, is the most valuable study of all.

WALTER LEWIN.

The Unknown Eros. By Coventry Patmore. (Bell.)

THE poems by which Mr. Coventry Patmore is best known—The Angel in the House, and its sequel, The Victories of Love—are like nothing in the present volume. Whether those poems or these are the better may be a matter of opinion. The power of satire, of strong invective, of passionate appeal and declamation, of which there are many examples here, is, no doubt, a more striking quality than any in the earlier works. But the majority of readers will still prefer those charming early poems—records, as they are, of a simple, understandable, human love—to the intellectual and political exclusiveness, and the theological narrowness, of an unfamiliar Eros. It is not worth while to quarrel with the title which Mr. Coventry Patmore gives to this collection of poems, though it is a little difficult to connect any possible Eros, known or unknown, with some of them. The volume is an expansion of a smaller collection, to which the name was less inappropriate. Perhaps if one were able to sympathise with Mr. Patmore's Romanist reconstruction of a Pagan ideal, the difficulty one is conscious of would disappear. But it is a thing of no consequence. Every poem has enough individuality of its own to be read apart from the rest; and the reader will find matter enough in all of them to occupy his thoughts, to the exclusion of vague and profitless speculations about the Eros which either is, or was, or was meant to be, unknown.

All the poems are written in the measure commonly employed for English odes. It has no recognised number of feet, which may be varied at the arbitrary will of the writer, who obtains the harmony he wants, and achieves the necessary force of expression, by a skilful variation of pauses. It is a measure which gives the poet almost the freedom of prose, and in the hands of an unskilful writer it would degenerate into prose. When used by a poet who knows how to humour and how to control its pliancy, it is capable of any degree of dignified expression. There are no better modern examples of the high service to which this measure may be put, and of the splendid results which may be attained with it, than Wordsworth's "Ode on the Intimations of Immortality," and Tennyson's "Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington." Wordsworth never excelled the power of imagination in the former poem; Tennyson has never surpassed the dignity of the latter. Mr. Coventry Patmore does not approach the level of these masters. But his failure to do so is attributable rather to the motive of his verse than to any lack of power or vigour in it. Indeed, it has too much vigour. The poet has become a controversialist. He has doffed his singing robes to don a priestly cowl, or the tell-tale livery of a politician. How little of the true spirit of the poet—how little of any quality of an immortal Eros (or a mortal one, either)—is to be found in these verses, taken from a poem headed "1880-85":

"Stand by,
Ye Wise, by whom Heav'n rules!
Your kingly hands suit not the hangman's tools.
When God has doom'd a glorious Past to die,
Are there no knaves and fools?
For ages yet to come your kind shall count for nought.
Smoke of the strife of other Powers
Than ours,
And tongues inscrutable with fury fraught
'Wild the sky,
Till the far good which none can guess be wrought.
Stand by!
Since tears are vain, here let us rest and laugh,
But not too loudly; for the brave time's come,
When Best may not blaspheme the Bigger Half,
And freedom for our sort means freedom to be dumb.
Lo, how the dross and draff
Jeer up at us, and shout,
'The Day is ours, the Night is theirs!'
And urge their rout
Where the wild dawn of rising Tartarus flares.
Yon strives their Leader, lusting to be seen.
His leprosy's so perfect that men call him clean!
Listen the long, sincere, and liberal bray
Of the earnest Puller at another's hay
'Gainst aught that dares to tug the other way,
Quite void of fears
With all that noise of ruin round his ears!"

Party feeling runs high in these days, and hard words are freely given from opposing sides without regard to the harm they do. But this allusion to a venerable statesman is in worse taste than anything one remembers in political controversy, or in the so-called "amenities" of journalism. It would be hard to match, too, the audacious intolerance with which Mr. Patmore writes down a section of the community as "knaves and fools," while describing his own political friends as the "Wise" and "Best." It is due to him to add that he is sometimes as intolerant towards the Tory party as towards their rivals. His scorn for "the false English nobles and their Jew," who brought in household suffrage, is as bitter as his disgust for the political "leprosy" of the Opposition leader. But these are not subjects for poetic treatment. The measure in which the "Intimations of Immortality" were expressed ought not to be made a mere vehicle of personal abuse. Nor should it be used for the glorification of the poet's own particular Church, and in scornful contempt of every other. Mr. Patmore's praises of Romanism would, at any rate, have had more fitness, or commanded more respect, if he had not reviled the progressive spirit of the age as eating "its dead dog off a golden dish."

In all this the poet does himself scant justice. One could wish he had allowed some of his judgments to be tempered by the admirable philosophy in the little poem called "Let Be!" He there says:

"Who does not know
That good and ill
Are done in secret still,
And that which shows is verily but show!
How high of heart is one, and one how sweet of mood:
But not all height is holiness,
Nor every sweetness good;
And grace will sometimes lurk where who could guess?"

A touching lesson, which enforces above all things the duty of charity and tenderness, is contained in another poem, which I venture to quote—familiar though it is—by way of counterpoise to the political verses previously quoted:

"THE TOYS.

"My little Son, who look'd from thoughtful eyes
And moved and spoke in quiet grown-up wise,
Having my law the seventh time disobey'd,
I struck him, and dismiss'd
With hard words and unkiss'd,
His Mother, who was patient, being dead.
Then, fearing lest his grief should hinder sleep,
I visited his bed,
But found him slumbering deep,
With darken'd eyelids, and their lashes yet
From his late sobbing wet.
And I, with moan,
Kissing away his tears, left others of my own;
For, on a table drawn beside his head,
He had put, within his reach,
A box of counters and a red-vein'd stone,
A piece of glass abraded by the beach
And six or seven shells,
A bottle with bluebells,
And two French copper coins, ranged there with careful art,
To comfort his sad heart.
So when that night I pray'd
To God, I wept, and said:
Ah, when at last we lie with tranced breath,
Not vexing Thee in death,
And Thou rememberest of what toys
We made our joys,
How weakly understood
Thy great commanded good,
Then, fatherly not less
Than I whom Thou hast moulded from the clay,
Thou'lt leave Thy wrath, and say,
'I will be sorry for their childishness.'"

There is the poet without the partisan, the poet more liberal than his creeds and bigger than his Church; and as such he is best.

GEORGE COTTERELL.

Social England under the Regency. By John Ashton. In 2 vols. (Ward & Downey.)

MR. ASHTON is a literary Autolycus, a snapper-up of unconsidered trifles. Here, as in his Old Times, Social Life in the Reign of Anne, and The Dawn of the Nineteenth Century, he seeks to illustrate the past by means of caricatures, street ballads, lampoons, newspaper paragraphs, and other ephemeral things. He is troubled by no ambition to penetrate the surface of his subject. He seldom or never rises to an inquiring and reflective mood. He shuns the main stream of history in favour of its many accessories and tributaries. Yet, humble as the function he assumes may be thought, his compilations are not without an attractiveness of their own. He at least contrives to amuse his readers, and might fairly boast that if it were not for his industrious researches many an incident of significance and interest would remain forgotten.

Naturally enough, the most conspicuous figure in the book is the Regent himself, who exposed the monarchical principle to the severest strain it has undergone with safety in this country. He came into power under a heavy load of unpopularity, which seemed to increase rather than diminish with lapse of time. His profligacy, his extravagance, his untruthfulness, and, above all, his treatment of the Princess of Wales, who was regarded as more sinned against than sinning, caused his name to be detested in nearly all quarters. Nor, despite the then frequent persecution of the press, did this feeling fail to find open and defiant expression. The caricaturists, apparently knowing that they had a large force of public opinion at their back, made the most of his corpulency, his personal vanity, his fondness for the bottle, and even some worse points in his character. For instance, at the end of 1811, when it was given out that by reason of a sprained ankle he had to keep his bed, they promptly ascribed his indisposition to another cause—namely, a sound thrashing inflicted upon him by Lady Yarmouth's husband for an insult he had put upon her. In one caricature, entitled "A Royal Milling Match," the peer is represented in the act of raining blows upon the royal countenance, with the lady looking on approvingly from behind a screen. It is unnecessary to go beyond Mr. Ashton's volumes for a proof of the estimation in which his Royal Highness was commonly held.

Napoleon frequently comes before us in the interval between Waterloo and his banishment to St. Helena. Here is a contemporary description of him on board the Bellerophon—

"He is about five feet seven inches in height, very strongly made, and well-proportioned; very broad and deep chest, legs and thighs proportioned with great symmetry and strength;

a small, round, and handsome foot. His countenance is sallow, and, as it were, deeply tinged by hot climates; but the most commanding air I ever saw. His eyes grey and the most piercing you can imagine. His glance, you fancy, searches into your inmost thoughts. His hair dark brown and no appearance of grey. His features are handsome now, and when younger he must have been a very handsome man. He is rather fat, and his belly protuberant; but he appears active notwithstanding. His step and demeanour altogether commanding. He looks about forty-five or forty-six years of age. He is extremely curious, and never passes anything remarkable in the ship without immediately demanding its use and inquiring minutely into the manner thereof. He dresses in green uniform, with red facings and edged with red, two plain gold epaulettes, the lapels of the coat cut round and turned back, white waistcoat and breeches, and military boots and spurs; the grand cross of the Legion of Honour on his left breast."

It is curious to find that in the revulsion of feeling which followed his exile Napoleon was thought to have been harshly used. Both in caricature and in verse the Regent was accused of trampling upon a fallen enemy. Tom Cribb, the pugilist, is thus made to rebuke the Prince—

"What, Ben, my big hero, is this thy renown?
Is this the new go—kick a man when he's down—
When the foe has knock'd under to tread on him then?
By the fist of my father I blush for thee, Ben!"

Now and then we are reminded that the Regency was an era of impending political change. The reaction against the doctrines of the French Revolution, which had consolidated for a time the power of the aristocracy, had already spent much of its force. Napoleon had scarcely been chained down at St. Helena when the cry for parliamentary reform was raised with startling vehemence, especially under the pressure of the distress which at intervals came over the country. Prominent among the many demagogues of the moment was Henry Hunt, a full-length portrait of whom is reproduced in this book. He is represented in the act of saying words long afterwards remembered—"I well know the superiority of mental over physical force; while we have the power of exercising the former, we cannot be justified in resorting to the latter"—a speech which, as Mr. Ashton remarks, was of the "Don't nail his ear to the pump" order. How little Hunt shrank from downright lying is shown by another of his utterances:

"You have all heard of George Canning, that impudent dog, that vile, unprincipled, unmanly calumniator of the people, that miscreant, whose language fails him in applying disgraceful epithets to you. But you do not know his family; nay, I do not believe he knows his own grandfather. Mother Hunn, who brought this hopeful cub into the world (without knowing who was his father), had £500 for the useful event, and her worthy daughters had also £500 each."

After all, however, this is only an average sample of the weapons employed in the political warfare of the time.

Mr. Ashton has collected most of the materials needed for a comprehensive account of England three-quarters of a century ago, with its widespread love of eccentric costume, hard-drinking, gambling, duelling, pugilism, cock-fighting, bullbaiting, and horse-racing. But in some respects his volumes are extremely disappointing. Few periods are so crowded with memorable achievements in literature as the nine years over which the Regency extended. It was the age of Wordsworth, Shelley, Coleridge, Keats, Byron, Moore, Southey, Scott, Maria Edgeworth, Jane Austen, Hazlitt, Leigh Hunt, Lamb, Brougham, Jeffrey, Sydney Smith, Dugald Stewart, and a good many more whose names stand high and bright before the world. Poetry, prose fiction, criticism, philosophy—all underwent new and important developments. Mr. Ashton, however, deals with this portion of his theme in less than one page. He is content with a bald enumeration in alphabetical order of the great writers of the time. Of the social gatherings in which so many of them were to be found he elects to say nothing. He affords us no glimpse of such places as Murray's back parlour. Music and painting and sculpture could also boast of distinguished votaries under the Regency, but these are treated by Mr. Ashton in precisely the same way. In dealing with the theatres he is scarcely more communicative. Edmund Kean, the most electrifying of tragic actors, is disposed of in half-a-dozen short sentences. And here I must remark that Mr. Ashton's sense of proportion is not always proof against his instincts as a maker of books. He gives a comparatively long account of "Romeo" Coates, though only because that harmless lunatic exposed himself to a torrent of ridicule on the stage.

Duelling was passing out of fashion, though by very slow degrees. Possibly its decline may have been accelerated by the following remarks of Lord Ellenborough on an application to the Court of King's Bench for a criminal information against two persons who had posted a merchant at Lloyd's as a coward for refusing a challenge:

"Really it is high time to put a stop to this spurious chivalry of the counting-house and the counter. The court has been for these two days occupied with cases of the sort. Yesterday it was an angry linendraper of Bristol, who had been a little time in the local militia, long enough to imbibe all the worst prejudices of the army, that thought proper to post a practising surgeon for not accepting a challenge; and to-day we have a mercantile man in the same predicament. Instead of posting their books, these tradesmen are posting one another. The court desires it to be understood that it is not necessary for the party applying for a remedy against such an outrage as this to come perfectly unblemished before them; and that if it shall be shown to be necessary for public quiet and justice they will interpose the remedy sought for. If the challenge in this case had been sent eo instanti upon the defendant's quitting the coffee-house, the court would have contemplated it as emanating from the venial irritation of the moment. But it appears that he at first applied to the prosecutor for an apology, upon the refusal of which his friend, the other defendant, was sent upon this mischievous and malignant mission to the prosecutor in the country; and then, because a man refuses to be hunted down when dining out at a friend's house, and challenged at six o'clock in the evening, he is to be posted for a coward at Lloyd's Coffee-house the next morning! Rule absolute."

Bartholomew Fair, the great Saturnalia of London, had long become an almost intolerable nuisance, but was not to be abolished until many years afterwards. Of the rowdiness to which it gave rise in 1812, the subjoined account is preserved by Mr. Ashton:

"The scene of riot, confusion, and horror exhibited at this motley festival on this night has seldom, if ever, been exceeded. The influx of all classes of labourers who had received their week's wages, and had come to the spot, was immense. At ten o'clock every avenue leading through the conspicuous parts of the Fair was crammed with an impenetrable mass of human creatures. Those who were in the interior of the crowd, howsoever distressed, could not be extricated, while those who were on the outside were exposed to the most imminent danger of being crushed to death against the booths. The females, hundreds of whom there were, who happened to be intermixed with the mob, were treated with the greatest indignity, in defiance of the exertions of husbands, relatives, or friends. This weaker part of the crowd, in fact, seemed to be on this occasion the principal object of persecution, or, as the savages who attacked them were pleased to call it, of fun. Some fainted, and were trodden under foot, while others, by an exertion almost supernatural, produced by an agony of despair, forced their way to the top of the mass, and crept on the heads of the people until they reached the booths, where they were received and treated with the greatest kindness. We lament to state that many serious accidents in consequence occurred; legs and arms innumerable were broken, some lives were lost, and the surgeons of St. Bartholomew's Hospital were occupied the whole of the night in administering assistance to the unfortunate objects who were continually brought to them. The most distressing scene that we observed arose from the suffocation of a child about a twelvemonth old in the arms of its mother, who, with others, had been involved in the crowd. The wretched mother did not discover the state of her infant until she reached Giltspur Street, when she rent the air with her shrieks of self-reproach; while her husband, who accompanied her, and who had the appearance of a decent tradesman, stood mute with the dead body of his child in his arms, which he regarded with a look of indescribable agony. Such are the heartrending and melancholy scenes which were exhibited, and yet this forms but a faint picture of the enormities and miseries attendant upon this disgraceful festival."

Early in 1814 the Thames was so deeply frozen over that a fair was held upon it:

"The Grand Mall, or Walk, was from Blackfriars Bridge to London Bridge. This was named the 'City Road,' and was lined on both sides with booths and petty tradesmen of all descriptions. Eight or ten printing-presses were erected, and numerous pieces commemorative of the great frost were printed on the ice. . . . Every day brought more people, and additions to the petty merchants, who vended their wares at twice or thrice their value, because of the rarity. . . . 'City Road' was hard and secure, and thousands promenaded thereon. Skittles were being played in many places, drinking tents were filled with females and their companions, dancing reels to the sound of fiddles, while others sat round large fires, drinking rum grog and other spirits. There were, for the more temperate, tea and coffee; and people were earnestly requested to eat, in order that in after years they might be able to say that they had indulged in a good meal in mid Thames."

One incident of the fair was the roasting of a small sheep over a coal fire in a large iron pan.

Some errors into which Mr. Ashton has fallen may here be pointed out. Adverting to the Regency scheme of 1789, he said that the Prince of Wales "made no objections" to it. As a matter of fact, his Royal Highness protested against the restrictions it contained, representing it as "one for disconnecting the authority to command service from the power of animating it by reward, and for allotting to the Prince all the invidious duties of government without the means of softening them to the public by any one act of grace, favour, or benignity." Again, Mr. Ashton's list of Regency writers includes names which we may well be astonished to find there, inasmuch as the bearers of them were not known to fame before the Regency ended. I refer particularly to those of Grote, Carlyle, Lytton, and Mrs. Norton. Mr. Ashton ought also to have been on his guard against such misprints as "Hannah Moore" and "Theodore Hooke."

FREDERICK HAWKINS.

Wild Beasts and their Ways. By Sir S. W. Baker. In 2 vols. (Macmillan.)

THESE first-fruits of the year's literary harvest of sport have been eagerly expected, and show that the discoverer of the Albert Nyanza has, in spite of advancing years, lost none of his cunning of hand either with rifle or pen. In point of interest these volumes are nowise inferior to his books on African travel in former days. They are dedicated by permission to the Prince of Wales as "a great traveller and true sportsman who has ever taken a keen interest in the study of natural history." And these words show the scope of the book—first, its devotion to sport; next, the survey which it takes of the habits of the wild animals described. The author disclaims any mere book-making. He relates his own experiences, and vouches for the accuracy of the curious ways of the wild beasts that he has observed. Mr. H. Dixon has ably seconded him with spirited illustrations of many of the creatures here treated. The result is a delightful book, which will instruct the sportsman as much as it charms the naturalist in his study. If Sir S. Baker's achievements remind us in one page of such renowned shikaris as Campbell, Gordon Cumming, and Leveson, we are irresistibly put in mind in the next of the careful observations and literary skill of C. St. John. The author's description of deer-stalking in Glen Tilt would not have discredited the latter writer's reputation, and no keener sportsman and better observer of British birds and beasts has as yet overshadowed St. John's fame.

Since his African explorations, Sir S. Baker has travelled in search of sport and adventure through India, Japan, Syria, and America. These pages reflect many of his recent experiences, though every here and there a careful reader will remember one or two of the more thrilling anecdotes of his former books. Thus, we have made the acquaintance before of the hyaena which intruded into his tent one night in Africa. After a sensible chapter on the weapons with which an explorer and sportsman should provide himself, the author enlarges on the elephant, the larger members of the felidae, bears, buffaloes, crocodiles, boars, and the cervidae, especially the sambur and the African antelopes. The chapters on the hippopotamus and rhinoceros are especially good, and bring out in strong relief the great strength and brute ferocity of these creatures. Thus the forests and plains of the world are laid under contribution, and an opportunity is given for relating much of the economy of these animals which is new to many students and full of interest to general readers. Many of these creatures are yearly becoming more difficult to find, as the spread of civilisation drives them further into the wilderness. For large game of any kind in Africa the sportsman must in most cases now seek his quarry beyond the Zambesi; while in North America wild beasts have been persecuted until they have to be pursued far into the North-West. Sir S. Baker gives plausible reasons for a belief that in a remote age the hippopotamus reached as far northwards as Cairo, and he remembers twenty-eight years ago seeing crocodiles in considerable numbers at Denderah. These have disappeared, thanks mainly to the steamboats; and they are scarce where they used to be exceedingly plentiful twenty years ago between the first and second cataracts to Wadi Halfa. He points out, too, that wild beasts can hold their own against all the pitfalls, bows, and lances of savage tribes; but the deadly rifle, with its terrifying explosion, soon drives them from the old haunts further into the wilderness. The author's adventures bear out the belief that almost all wild animals are glad to slink from man, and slow to attack him if they are not themselves assailed. This is notoriously the case with the tiger. But if they are injured or persecuted, even the weakest will fight for life. A case lately came before us which illustrates this tendency. A park-fed fallow stag, ordinarily perfectly harmless, entangled itself in some wire railings, and on the keeper attempting to extricate it, it fell upon him and severely injured him. In connexion with a determined and unprovoked attack made by a white rhinoceros, usually deemed a harmless animal, upon Mr. Osell, a great African hunter, Sir A. Baker adds, "many beasts which are accredited with bad characters conduct themselves occasionally as though abject cowards; in the same manner those which are considered timid may, when least expected, exhibit great ferocity." In another passage he shows that the vaunted power of the human eye in quelling a wild beast is much exaggerated. It is always safer, with such a creature, not to meet its gaze in full, when it will often take no notice of the intruder. To fix the eye upon its eyes is frequently to provoke its attack. Something analogous to this may be noticed in the habits of our native pacific quadrupeds and birds. Casually cast a glance at them and they do not seem to mind. Turn a fixed gaze on them and they at once retreat or take to flight.

The author has a good deal to say about the political mismanagement which has converted his old friends the Hamran or sword-hunting Arabs into bitter foes of England, and caused the abandonment of countries opened of old by his years of hard work and patient toil throughout the Soudan. Nor does he forget to assail the mismanagement which has destroyed Newera Ellia in Ceylon, where he formerly resided, and to which we owe a charming book, instead of establishing it as a sanatorium for the troops. It is more pleasant to turn to the main subject of the book. The chapters on elephant-hunting and elephant-nature are delightful reading, proving that, in spite of the researches of Tennent and Sanderson, there is still much that is novel to be told of these animals. Their treacherous character, and the manner in which they must be governed by fear and not by affection, are well brought out.

After Sir J. Fayer's classical book on tigers, and the innumerable multitude of works on tiger-shooting, it might be thought that little remained to be added concerning the nature, habits, and hunting of these creatures, and yet Sir S. Baker's pages on these points are profoundly interesting. Striking incidents abound in them, and no opportunity is lost of illustrating the animal's traits both in quietude and when pursued. For safety among these fiercer creatures he recommends a .577 rifle of 12 lbs. weight, with a solid 650 grain bullet. Lighter weapons are apt to fail the hunter at a critical moment, and failure means in most cases death. It is a sore temptation to quote from the author on the habits of the lion, an animal less understood than, perhaps, are any of its family, in spite of its renown; but, as everyone interested in wild animals will read these fascinating chapters, there is the less need for regret. Indeed, searching observations on animal's habits and character may be found in every page. Here is an admirable account of hunting with a cheetah; there is a note how a hippopotamus dives, differing therein from most aquatic animals, as it sinks backwards and disappears by throwing its nose upwards. Crocodiles are duly described in another chapter, and their cunning shown to be equal to their ferocity. Antelopes and deer of all kinds receive half a volume's consideration; and of course our old friend, the wild boar, bold, courageous, and game to his last breath, is duly commemorated.

Well written, well illustrated, and well printed, he must be a fastidious critic who could quarrel with the many good things which are spread before him in Wild Beasts and their Ways. It is honourably distinguished from the crowd of books and articles annually published on hunting wild animals by its repression of the barbarous details of shooting, smashing of legs, scattering of brains, and the like, and the attention it invariably pays instead to their curious instincts and singular habits. These form a subject of the deepest interest to many thousands of lovers of animals who are never likely to lift a rifle against an elephant or spend an exciting night in a "machau" waiting for a tiger.

NEW NOVELS.

The House of Halliwell. By Mrs. Henry Wood. In 3 vols. (Bentley.)

Margaret Byng. By F. C. Philips and Percy Fendall. In 2 vols. (White.)

Pierre et Jean. From the French of Guy de Maupassant. (Heinemann.)

A Son of Issachar. By E. S. Brooks. (Putnam's.)

Senilia. Prose-Poems. By Ivan Turgénieff. (Bristol: Arrowsmith.)

Under the Gum Tree. By Mrs. Campbell Praed and others. (Trischler.)

ONE of the misfortunes of popularity is the ready market for inferior work. The late Mrs. Henry Wood wrote so much excellent fiction, entertained so long and so well an immense number of readers, that any literary production of hers would deserve the full courtesies of critical attention. Now that this busy author, whose posthumous writings form quite a little library in themselves, is no longer among us, there is all the more need for scrupulous care in the expression of his opinions upon the part of a reviewer. Yet the present critic can find no words of welcome, can give no hint of praise, to The House of Halliwell. The book ought not to have been published at this late date; for not once in the many years since it was written—a period dating from before the composition of her early work, East Lynne—does the idea of its publication seem to have crossed Mrs. Wood's mind. It is a girlish production, but with little of the spontaneity and charm of naïveté and youth which so often redeems the early efforts of women who have made a name in fiction. It is, in a word, a dull story, with characterisation for the most part feeble and indistinct, without due ordering of incident and episode, and further handicapped by an indifferent plot. Matters are scarce mended by the preface. The story, C. W. W. admits,

"differs a little in style and construction from the author's later works, but possibly for that reason may bear its own especial interest in indicating how the dramatic and constructive power of a writer is developed by experience. For, as an essayist recently remarked, talent exhausts itself, but genius goes on from strength to strength."

'Tis an unfortunate plea. C. W. W. makes a further claim for the book; but, if all be as he says, why did not so popular a novelist issue, or prepare to issue, the story herself? Mrs. Wood's wise reticence is the most fitting comment that could be made. There are portions of the novel which are creditable; and, though overdrawn and dragged too often and obtrusively into view of the reader, Aunt Cobb (who will be familiar to those who know Mrs. Wood's Red Court Farm) affords that saving grace without which all would be wearisome. As for the assertion that

"every page of The House of Halliwell, from the opening to the closing scenes, bears the impression of the hand of the author of East Lynne, whose place in the world of Fiction is marked by a style and individuality that cannot be mistaken and cannot be imitated," all that the conscientious critic can say is, that such special pleading seems to indicate private doubts. The House of Halliwell will give little pleasure to those who know Mrs. Henry Wood's books, nor will it prove a lure to the latter with those who here first make the author's acquaintance.

There is, decidedly, a good deal of Mr. F. C. Philips in Margaret Byng. What share his collaborator has taken in the story is not manifest, save at the close. The larger and certainly the more important part is, it seems to me (though I may be wrong), clearly recognisable as the work of the author of As in a Looking Glass. Mr. Philips delights in the shady side of society life, and he has here produced as shady and unattractive a view of the career of people who live by their wits as the most embittered cynic could wish. Margaret Byng herself is simply his wonted "heroine" dressed up anew and renamed; the young woman is, indeed, becoming too familiar. One of the advantages of collaboration is, it has been said, variety of theme and treatment; but in the present instance the partnership has not had the successful issue which might have been anticipated. But there is, at least, a dramatic consistency throughout; and there are episodes which the playwright could make singularly effective upon the stage. Yet how hackneyed it all is! How conventional the impecunious father, Colonel Heathcote; the virtuous lover, Captain Corry; the melodramatic villain, Bazano! The whole thing can be found again and again in Thackeray, but with infinite art. Réchauffés are seldom seductive; but réchauffés of réchauffés are apt to become intolerable.

It is a relief to turn from Mrs. Wood's early novel, and from a book at once so interesting ("on the lower plane," as an esoteric Buddhist would say) and yet so unsatisfactory as Margaret Byng, to Clara Bell's excellent translation of Guy de Maupassant's artistic romance, with its subdued but singular charm. Not a page is wasted by this master of his craft, not a paragraph expended where a brief sentence would suffice, not a touch laid that could be dispensed with. One may read Pierre et Jean with pleasure, apart from the interest of the story; it has all the satisfying completeness inevitable to a work wherein the author has known exactly the effect he wished to produce, with tact and skill to apply that knowledge supremely well. I am glad to see that M. de Maupassant's famous preface "On the Novel" is not omitted. It should be studied by every would-be novelist. After all, the craft is known in France—is practised, at any rate—to a perfection which we do not find here, or but rarely.

Biblical novels are becoming the vogue, apparently. Miss Phelps's Come Forth and Mr. E. S. Brooks's Son of Issachar are among the latest comers: but others, in somewhat embarrassing quantity, are rumoured to be "preparing." As a rule, this species of the genus Novel contains much more diluted Scripture than good romance; but A Son of Issachar is an exception. It is a picturesque and stirring story of the time of Christ, and is clearly the product of scholarly knowledge as well as of that historic imagination the lack of which has ruined so many novels of this class. The story is that of Cheliel Bar-Asha, a son of the clan of Issachar, who, after a noble and steadfast life, suffered martyrdom in the ravine of Jehoshaphat and won immortality as St. Stephen.

It is, no doubt, taking an undue liberty with the word "novel" to include in a review of recent works of fiction the short, masterly, and often exquisite "prose-poems" of the foremost Russian master in fiction, but, perhaps, scarce more so than to call these productions poems in prose. They are finely-wrought thoughts and fancies, often truly poetic in conception, and they not infrequently leave upon the mind a sense of haunting pleasure akin to that of rhythmic excitement. But Turgénieff knew best when he called them simply Senilia, meaning thereby not the faggots from an old tree, but the ripest and rarest fruit of maturity. The pathos, the delicacy of touch, the serene insight, the half-regretful cynicism, the occasional savage irony, the child-like naïveté, and the virginal tenderness of this great writer are shadowed in these short pieces, each brief as most short poems, and yet as rounded and complete as the finest sonnets of Wordsworth. The translation seems satisfactory in the main, though it appears to be, at least in large part, from the admirable French version.

There are so many Australian novels and stories coming from the press that one might suppose the island-continent to be of absorbing interest to the British public in general. One might certainly go further and fare worse; but the most enthusiastic admirer of stories of life under the Southern Cross must admit that monotony of theme, if not of treatment, mars most contemporary Australian fiction. The dozen short tales in Under the Gum Tree, however, are certainly as good of their kind as any I have lately seen. All are racy of the soil and of colonial life; and one or two, particularly "John Grantley's Conversion," by Tasma, touch a higher literary level than one expects to meet with in a collection of this kind.

WILLIAM SHARP.

SOME MODERN GREEK BOOKS.

M. PSICHARI'S work, Essais de Grammaire Historique Néo-grecque, which was reviewed in the ACADEMY for March 12, 1887, is now completed by the appearance of the second volume (Paris: Leroux). This contains the pièces justificatives on which the conclusions of the former part were based, consisting of comparative tables of the ancient, mediæval, and modern forms of those parts of words which the author subjected to examination for the purpose of tracing the history of the development of the popular Greek language. To these lists, which represent a prodigious amount of learned labour, is prefixed an introduction, which comprises a study of the mediæval language from the eleventh to the seventeenth century, especially in respect of such points as its phonetic changes, the modifications introduced by the influence of ecclesiastical and official writers, and the phenomena produced by the working of analogy. These discussions may be commended to the attention of comparative philologists as highly instructive, and as throwing light on many questions in the history of other languages. At the end of the volume two appendices are added—one on the text of Georgillas' poem of the Plague of Rhodes, in the course of which M. Psichari animadverts severely on the late Dr. W. Wagner's collation of the Paris MS., and on his method of correcting the text; while the other is a study of the mediæval Cretan texts. In his opinion the Cretan poem of Erotocritos, the date of which is placed by M. Jannaris before 1508 (see ACADEMY for Aug. 10, 1889, p. 84), was composed towards the end of the sixteenth century.

M. PSICHARI is well known as being the strongest opponent of the quasi-Hellenistic idiom in which the modern Greek newspapers and other prose writings of the present day are composed. His reasons for maintaining the superiority and rightful claims of the popular language have been forcibly stated in his Ἱστορικὰ καὶ γλωσσολογικὰ ζητήματα (Constantinople: Pallamary), which were delivered in the form of addresses before the Φιλολογικὸς Σύλλογος of Constantinople in 1888. In this matter M. Psichari has the courage of his opinions, for he has published a volume entitled My Journey (Τὸ Ταξίδι μὲν, Athens: Blastos), which is written throughout in the spoken language. This book, which gives an account of the author's visits to Constantinople, Chios, and Athens, contains impressions of travel rather than descriptions; and its narrative is accompanied by reflexions and digressions, especially on the subject of the language. It is written in a lively style throughout, and shows how much may be expressed in the popular idiom. To persons accustomed to the spoken tongue, it conveys the impression of the conversation of a familiar acquaintance. To those who only know the written language, it will seem to be composed in an almost unknown dialect: but to these also it may be of service, in teaching them of how little use the majority of Modern Greek grammars and reading books are in helping a foreigner to make himself understood in the country.

THOSE of our readers who, when staying at Athens, have made the excursion to Eleusis will have noticed the ancient monastery of Daphni, which has given its name to the pass over Mount Aegaleos between those two places. A monograph on the subject of this building has recently been published by M. Lambakes, entitled Χριστιανικὴ Ἀρχαιολογία τῆς Μόνης Δαφνίου (Athens: Papageorgios). In this the history of the structure is traced from the thirteenth century, when the first authentic records of its existence occur, to the present day; and the author narrates in some detail the disasters to which it has recently been exposed from shocks of earthquakes and from vandalism. The most important portion of the book is that which relates to the church, and especially to its mosaics. These are elaborately described and illustrated by woodcuts, and the architecture and decorations are compared with those that are found in various other Christian buildings. There is also a carefully drawn plan of the church. It is gratifying to learn that the expenses involved in the publication of the monograph were guaranteed by the Marquis of Bute.

IT has long been known to persons interested in the subject that a catalogue of the manuscripts in the monastery of St. John at Patmos had been made by Sakkelion, the learned ex-librarian of that body. It now proves that the work was completed as much as thirty years ago; but from various causes the publication of it was delayed, and it is now brought out at the expense of the "Parnassos" Philological Society of Athens, with the title Πατμιακὴ Βιβλιοθήκη (Athens: Papageorgios). The style in which it is produced is in all respects worthy of that society, for it forms a handsome quarto with excellent paper and type. The catalogue itself leaves nothing to be desired, for it contains a full account of the contents of each volume, of the size, approximate date, and other features of the manuscripts, and of the illuminations of those which are thus embellished. The compiler's notes also display a satisfactory knowledge of the literature of the subject, and the plates at the end of the work supply specimens of the mode of writing employed in different centuries. Here the student will find an account of the famous Codex N, an uncial MS. of St. Mark's Gospel in silver letters on purple vellum of the sixth century, smaller fragments of which MS. exist, as Tischendorf discovered, in the Vatican, in the Vienna Library, and in the British Museum. Next in importance to this is the Book of Job of the seventh or eighth century, with its highly original illustrations; after which comes the Gregory Nazianzen of the tenth century. We should also notice—though M. Sakkelion does not seem to recognise their value—the two volumes of the sacred poems of Romanus, of which Dr. Krumbacher, who has copied them and proposes to publish them, says that they raise Romanus to the position of the first of hymn-writers. For the other valuable MSS. which this library contains we must refer the reader to the catalogue itself. In his preface the compiler makes merry (with good reason) over the mistakes in the description of the books in the library which have been made by Western savants; and we sympathise with him in his complaints with regard to the loss of MSS. which the monastery has from time to time sustained, though we are not certain that he apportions the blame in this matter with even-handed justice. The fragmentary state of Codex N is as likely, we should suppose, to have been caused by the cupidity of former monks as by the predatory habits of visitors, to which he attributes it. And when, in speaking of the removal of the MS. of Plato—which is now in the Bodleian Library—by Dr. E. D. Clarke in the year 1801, he says that, according to the tradition in the monastery, it was obtained through Turkish influence against the will of the monks, we would ask his readers, before accepting this statement, to read Clarke's own account, as given in the third volume of his Travels, pp. 344 foll. His description of the proceeding, which is very circumstantial, is altogether different from that of M. Sakkelion. We are not anxious to act as champions of those who in former days purchased valuable MSS. for nominal sums in Eastern monasteries, even though these treasures may have been negligently preserved; but it is right to avoid the imputation of robbery when it is not well established.

In May last appeared the first volume of a new encyclopaedia in Modern Greek, which promises to be a work of considerable importance (Δεξικὸν ἑγκυκλοπαιδικόν: Athens: Barth and von Hirst). The editor is Prof. N. G. Polites, the active secretary of the Historical Society of Greece, who is well known as a writer on mythology and folk-lore, and as one of the most vigorous of the literary men of Greece at the present time. His name, and those of his numerous collaborateurs, are a guarantee for the thoroughness of the work which they have taken in hand. The scope of this publication is a very ambitious one, for it contains not only what we expect to find in an ordinary encyclopaedia, but also such subjects as are usually relegated to classical or technological dictionaries. Hence, beside such topics as fall under the general heads of science, art, literature, geography, biography, and natural history, we meet with articles on points relating to mechanics, medicine, anatomy, folk-lore, antiquities, law, and even theology. Great attention is rightly paid to the topography and ethnology of Greece itself and of the countries in its neighbourhood; and in the present volume 35 pages are devoted to Acarnania and Aetolia. The most important of the other articles are those on Athens, architecture, the Alexandrian schools of philosophy and theology, Egypt, America (including the United States), and England. In connexion with the last-named heading, not only general intelligence about the country is communicated, but summaries of information are given about the Anglican Church, its parties, and its relation to the Eastern Church; about the English constitution; and about the history of the language and literature, the art and philosophy. On many subjects the minuteness of detail is surprising. Thus, under the heading Αἰσώπορις we find biographies both of Harrison Ainsworth the novelist, and of W. F. Ainsworth the veteran geographer. And, as regards geography, we are free to confess that we meet with notices of places not only on the continent of Europe, but even in Scotland, of which we have never heard. It is the editor's intention to complete the work in six or seven volumes; but it is hard to see how this can be accomplished, when the work is projected on so large a scale. The present instalment, with its 960 pages, does not nearly exhaust the letter A.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MR. BERNARD QUARITCH has issued the prospectus of a Dictionary of English Book-collectors, from the earliest recorded examples to the present time, somewhat after the scheme of Guigard's Armorial du Bibliophile. Recognising the impossibility of completing such a work in a satisfactory manner by individual effort, he makes an appeal to all those interested in the subject to afford him their co-operation, by supplying him with materials that may be within their knowledge. For his part, he undertakes to have the auctioneers' catalogues searched for all the information they contain, and to obtain from sources at his own disposal all the book-plates which may be needed for reproduction. The details required in each case are—the chief dates and facts of the man's life; some specification of the more important and remarkable works which he collected; and a brief account of the fate of his library, tracing the devolution of some of its items through later hands. Illustrations will be given of such tokens of ownership as escutcheons, mottoes, book-plates, or modes of binding peculiar to certain libraries. The work will be arranged in alphabetical order, under the names of collectors; and it is proposed to print off each article on a separate leaf as soon as it is ready, leaving the collection into volumes to come later.

MR. GLADSTONE, before starting for Scotland, completed the revision and enlargement of his articles on "The Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture." The book is now passing through the press, and will be published next month by Messrs. Isbister.

COUNT TOLSTOI has just completed a play, an English version of which Mr. William Heinemann hopes to publish early in the new year. As the Russian authorities are unlikely to permit anything from the pen of Count Tolstoi to appear in Russia, Mr. Heinemann may possibly bring out also an edition of the Russian original.

THE Queen has accepted the dedication of the Ancient Vellum Book of the Honourable Artillery Company, edited by Lieut.-Col. G. A. Raikes, and printed by order of the Court of Assistants. The book contains the autographs of nearly all the sovereigns from the time of Charles II., besides many civil and military celebrities, including Prince Rupert, the Duke of Albemarle, John Milton, and Sir Christopher Wren. It will be published shortly by Messrs. George Bentley & Son.

MESSRS. BLACKWOOD & SONS have in the press a memoir of the late Laurence Oliphant, written by Mrs. Oliphant, the novelist and biographer of Principal Tulloch, but no relation of her subject.

THE continuation of Prof. Mahaffy's History of Greek Life and Thought, dealing with the Greek world under Roman sway, will be published by Messrs. Macmillan in the course of next month.

MR. STANFORD will shortly publish a small volume, by Mr. J. Scott Keltie, secretary to the Royal Geographical Society, entitled The Partition of Africa, dealing mainly with the events of the past six years and their results. In an introductory chapter or two, Mr. Keltie shows what has been the footing of Europe in Africa from the earliest times, and endeavours to estimate the value of the shares of the various European powers in the scramble, from the points of view of commerce and colonisation.

A VOLUME entitled Fifty Years of my Life in Ceylon is about to be published by Messrs. Allen & Co. It is a record of the work done in the first half of the century by Major Skinner, who devoted his life to Ceylon, and was the first to open up communications throughout the island by means of roads and bridges. The author, we understand, is a daughter of the late Colonel Meadows Taylor.

A NEW popular handbook to the antiquities and history of London and the suburbs is announced by Mr. Elliot Stock, under the title London of the Past: or, the Olden City.

UNDER the title of A Cracked Fiddle, the Rev. Frederick Langbridge, of Limerick, proposes to issue a selection from his several volumes of poems, as well as from his verses scattered, since the publication of Poor Folk's Lives, through magazines and booklets.

THE next volume in the series of "English Men of Action" will be Warwick, the King-maker, written by Mr. C. Oman, of All Souls' College, Oxford.

MR. ARROWSMITH, of Bristol, announces a volume entitled Forty Years of Cricket, by Dr. W. G. Grace.

THE following are some of the articles in the sixth volume of the new edition of Chambers's Encyclopaedia, which will be published very shortly:—"India," by Sir Richard Temple; "Ireland," by Mr. Justin McCarthy, Prof. Mackinnon, and Prof. G. T. Stokes; "Jerusalem," by Mr. Walter Besant; "London," by the Rev. W. J. Loftie; "Madagascar," by the Rev. James Sibree; "Malays," by Prof. A. H. Keane; "Logic," by Prof. Seth; "Libraries," by Mr. T. G. Law; "Law," by Mr. Thomas Raleigh; "Mineralogy," by Prof. James Geikie; "Jesus Christ," by Archdeacon Farrar; "Hymn," by the Rev. John Julian; "Liturgy," by the Marquis of Bute; "Job," by Prof. A. B. Davidson; "Lake-Dwelling," by Dr. Joseph Anderson; "Liquor Laws," by Sir Charles Dilke; "Laotze," by Prof. Legge; "Immigration," by Mr. Arnold White; "Jest-Books," by Mr. W. A. DR. W. CLARKE ROBINSON, of Kenyon College, Ohio, formerly of Durham University, has in the press, to be issued immediately, a book on Shakespeare: the Man and His Mind, dedicated to Dr. H. H. Furness, of Philadelphia.

MR. PAUL LEICESTER FORD, of 97, Clarke-street, Brooklyn, U.S.A., being engaged in the preparation of an edition of the writings of Thomas Jefferson, requests those possessing any of Jefferson's letters or manuscripts to communicate with him. If such persons will either lend them to Mr. Ford for a short time he will guarantee their safe return; or if they will have them copied, he will pay the expense, and give due credit for such assistance in the work.

MR. HORACE WEIR is contributing to the columns of the Derbyshire Advertiser a series of sketches of picturesque and romantic places in the Peak district.

MESSRS. EDEN, REMINGTON, & Co. announce that their business will henceforth be carried on at 15, King-street, Covent Garden.

THE Browning Society will open their tenth session with an evening of Browning music and recitations in the Botany theatre, University College, on Friday next, October 31. The musical portion of the programme will be rendered by students of the Royal Academy of Music; the recitations are under the direction of Miss Florence Bourne. Application for tickets should be made to the honorary secretary, Mr. E. E. Davies, 2, Wallace-road, Canonbury, N.

MESSRS. A. & C. BLACK, of Edinburgh, have begun the publication of a new popular edition of the Waverley Novels, in sixpenny volumes, to be issued at intervals of a month. This is a "copyright" edition, in so far that it will contain the latest corrections and MS. notes of the author. Each volume will be illustrated with vignettes, and will have a glossary, explaining both the Scotch and the foreign words.

FORTHCOMING MAGAZINES.

DR. CARL PETERS will contribute to the next number of The Contemporary Review a short article on the relations of Stanley and Emin Pasha, in which he gives Emin's own account of the matter as told to him at Mpwapwa, "with the understanding that he should be permitted to publish it."

MR. J. M. BARRIE has completed "The Little Minister," his first three-volume novel, which will appear in Good Words, beginning in January. The scene is laid in Thrums, in the time of the Chartist riots. Mrs. Oliphant will also contribute a serial novel to next year's Good Words; and the new Bishop of Winchester will write monthly short practical papers on "Questions of the Christian Life."

THE November number of the English Illustrated Magazine will have an illustrated article on "Winchester College," to which Lord Selborne contributes the introduction, and Mr. F. Gale school recollections. The frontispiece will be an engraving, by Mr. W. Biscombe Gardner, of Reynolds's "Portrait of Two Gentlemen" in the National Gallery.

SOME "Memorials of Father Anderdon, S.J.," by his uncle, Cardinal Manning, by Father Ignatius Grant, and by other friends, will appear with a portrait in the November number of Merry England.

THE November number of Macmillan's Magazine will contain an article entitled "Cyprus after Twelve Years of British Rule," by Mr. R. Hamilton Lang; and a poem on "Autumn," by Mr. R. Le Gallienne.

THE forthcoming number of the Scottish Review will contain a further instalment of Prof. Rhys's Rhind Lectures, dealing with the mythographical treatment of Celtic ethnology; and a paper on "The Early Christians in Syria," by Major C. R. Conder.

PROF. SAYCE will contribute to the new volume of The Sunday at Home, beginning with the November number, a series of papers on "Social Life among the Assyrians and Babylonians."

THE forthcoming number of Igdrasil will have a contribution from the pen of the author of "In Tennyson Land," Mr. J. Cuming Walters, who has been visiting the localities connected with the Arthurian romance this summer, and has discovered some important biographical particulars concerning the Laureate which have not previously been published. The number will also contain articles by Mr. W. Marwick on "Reading Guilds and Home Reading Circles," and a poem of several stanzas by Mr. John Addington Symonds.

THE November issue of the Bookworm will contain the fourth of the series of papers on "The History of the Gentleman's Magazine," the present instalment dealing with its editors and publishers.

THE Countess of Meath will contribute an article, entitled "A Woman's Thoughts on Travel" to the November part of the Quiver, which opens a new volume. In the same number will be commenced three new serial stories, the authors being Evelyn Everett Green, Mrs. Neal, and the Rev. P. B. Power, while the frontispiece will be a reproduction in colours of a drawing by the late Alice Havers, entitled "A Daughter of Sympathy."

IN consequence of the renewed activity of the Socialistic movement in Germany, the monthly periodical, Neue Zeit, which is the "central organ of international social democracy," has been transformed into a weekly. It will be published, as before, at Stuttgart.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

THE most notable features of the election for members of the hebdomadal council at Oxford on Wednesday were the substitution of Prof. Case and Canon Paget for Prof. Pelham and Prof. Freeman (both of whom retired), and the rejection of Prof. Nettleship. What are known as the academical conservatives obtained a large majority.

MR. E. W. HOBSON, of Christ's College, has been appointed deputy for the Lowndean professor of astronomy and mathematics at Cambridge for the Michaelmas and Lent terms. The necessity for this appointment, we regret to hear, arises from the ill-health of Prof. Adams, who has occupied the chair for thirty-two years.

MR. E. A. MINCHIN, of Keble College, who obtained a first class in science last summer, is lecturing this term at Oxford as demonstrator to Prof. Ray Lankester, the newly appointed deputy-professor of human anatomy.

MISS JANE HARRISON will give a course of four lectures at Cambridge this term upon "Greek Art, especially Vase-Painting, in relation to Greek Mythology." The lectures will be delivered in the museum of classical archaeology; and this is, we understand, the first occasion a lady lecturer has received such a measure of recognition.

IN connexion with the Oxford Association for the Education of Women, Mr. Arthur Sidgwick will deliver a lecture on Wednesday next, October 29, upon "Robert Browning."

MR. T. W. ALLEN, whose name will be known to readers of the ACADEMY by his work on Greek MSS. in Italian libraries, has been elected to an official fellowship at Queen's College, Oxford, of which he was formerly a scholar.

THE senate at Cambridge has adopted a series of resolutions concerning the mechanical workshops of the university, which will come into effect when the vacant chair of mechanics and engineers has been filled up. Henceforth, the management of the workshops will be under the immediate control of the professor; and no work for profit is to be undertaken, unless it can be carried on without interfering with the course of instruction.

THE fund being raised towards a memorial of the late Dr. Liddon, one object of which is to found theological scholarships in connexion with Keble College, Oxford, already amounts to nearly £8000.

THE Oxford Magazine of October 22 contains an appreciative notice of Prof. Thorold Rogers, signed L.R.P., and a report of a lecture by Mrs. Finn, in the hall of Exeter College, upon "Ancient Hebrew Monuments and Alphabets," in which she gave the result of her seventeen years' residence in Palestine.

A LETTER has been addressed to the lord president of the privy council by Dr. Ericson, president of University College, and the Rev. Dr. Wace, principal of King's College, defining the position of those bodies with regard to the project for the establishment of a teaching university in London. They state that, as the result of negotiation with the senate of London University, an agreement has been arrived at for a separate system of graduation for their students in the faculties of arts and science; but they add that they do not see their way to meet the objections that have been urged by the provincial colleges against any change in the present system of examination.

THE death is announced of the Rev. James A. Galbraith, senior fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, and one of the best known members of that university, with which he had been connected for half a century. In 1854, he was elected to the Erasmus Smith chair of natural philosophy; and for many years he acted as secretary to the senate. His latest appointment, we believe, was that of professor of mechanics in the school of engineering.

MR. JONATHAN HUTCHINSON, president of the Royal College of Surgeons, was to open the session of the medical society at Edinburgh on Friday of this week with an address.

ON Friday, October 17, Prof. Lewis Campbell gave a reading of his English verse-translation of the "Oedipus Tyrannus" at Manchester, before the Owens College Union, which supplied the occasion for a very able criticism in the Manchester Guardian of the next day, concluding with an appeal to the actor-managers of London to let us see the play upon the stage.

ORIGINAL VERSE.

THE SECRET OF THE SPRING.

WERE we together when the world was young,
Close to the secret which the mavis sung,
Leaving untold the wonder of the Spring,
Round which our souls darted on swallow-wing?

Far from that secret have I liv'd since then,
Watching things earthly through the eyes of men;
And thou, though journeying on the heavenly plane,
Shalt never know it till we meet again.

OBITUARY.

SIR RICHARD BURTON, K.C.M.G.

THE news of Sir Richard Burton's death, though sudden at the last, hardly came as a surprise to his friends. About three years ago his health broke down, partly from the excessive strain he imposed upon himself in the production of his "Arabian Nights"; and he has since been kept alive only by the devotion of his wife, and the assiduous care of his medical attendant, Dr. Baker. At his post to the last, in a city which he had long ceased to like and in a climate most unsuited to his constitution, he died at Trieste on the morning of Monday, October 20, in the seventieth year of his age.

Richard Francis Burton was born on March 19, 1821, at Barham House in Hertfordshire. His father was an officer in the Queen's service, whose family had been settled for some three generations in Ireland. Up to the age of nineteen, his early education was picked up on the continent, as his father moved from place to place, through France, Germany, and Italy, according to the fashion of those days. Thus he learnt not only languages, but various dialects of those languages, the use of the sword, and a habit of restlessness. Strange as it may seem, the boy was destined for the Church; and accordingly, in November, 1840, he was entered at Trinity College, Oxford—the same college to which William Gifford Palgrave came up as a scholar three years later. Burton's career at Oxford was short and stormy, though it is related that even he fell under the fascination of Newman's sermons at St. Mary's. After residing little more than three terms, he was "rusticated"; and without much delay succeeded in obtaining a cadetship in the Indian army. The voyage out to India round the Cape took four months. In October, 1842, he landed at Bombay, and was forthwith posted to the 18th regiment of native infantry, on the cadre of which he remained until superseded, without half-pay or pension, in 1861. His actual service in India lasted for only about seven years. He arrived too late for the first Afghan War; nor was he fortunate enough to take part either in Sir Charles Napier's conquest of Sind, or in the subsequent siege of Multan. In fact, he never saw active service in his life; for he was similarly balked of employment in the Crimea. But these seven years in India were not thrown away. A large part of them were spent in the survey of Sind, under Napier's rule, which permitted him both leisure and independence. It was during this period that he laid in the stock of linguistic attainment and knowledge of oriental life which qualified him for his subsequent adventures. His two first publications were papers of the Bombay branch of the Royal Asiatic Society on the Beloch and the Afghan languages. Coming home to Europe on sick-leave in 1849, he passed some time in France, and there acquired the brevet de pointe which authorised him to style himself—as he does on the title page of his book on the Sword—maître d'armes. Having obtained an extension of furlough for a year, "to enable him to pursue his Arabic studies," he now proceeded to realise his daring project of making the pilgrimage to Meccah and el-Medinah in the garb of a Pathan hakim, Shaykh Abdullah—as he was wont to sign himself ever afterwards in Arabic. This pilgrimage occupied the summer of 1853, and was described in three notable volumes (1855, second edition 1879). From Egypt he went back to Bombay, and there obtained authority to explore Somali-land, that still little-known horn of Africa which faces Aden. On this expedition he had Captain Speke as his companion for the first time. Starting alone in disguise in October, 1854, he penetrated successfully to the city of Harrar; but when the main expedition set out from the port of Berberah in April of the following year, they were attacked at night by an overwhelming force of Somalis, one Englishman of the party was killed, both Burton and Speke were severely wounded, and the enterprise was abandoned. Returning to England to recruit his health, Burton wrote First Footsteps in Eastern Africa (1856); and promptly left again for Constantinople, where he organised a force of 4000 Bashi Bazuks, as chief of the staff to General Beatson. The failure of this force is matter of history; equally unsuccessful were two personal schemes of Burton—to relieve Kars and to raise the Circassians under Schamyl. In brief, the Crimean War was to Burton very much what it was to Tom Thurnall; but Burton soon found another job ready to his hand. Returning to Bombay towards the end of 1856, he then set out, again in company with Speke, to discover the lakes of Central Africa and the sources of the Nile. The expedition, which occupied more than two years, was attended with great hardships, and resulted in a bitter estrangement between the two friends. After this lapse of time, none will dispute Burton's claim to have discovered Lake Tanganyika, which even Livingstone to the day of his death believed to be connected with the Nile system. The accurate survey of the Victoria Nyanza, the main reservoir of the headwaters of the Nile, was reserved for the second expedition of Speke and Grant, the latter of whom is now the sole survivor of the pioneers of discovery in Central Africa.

With this expedition closes the first and most exciting period of Burton's life. Henceforth, though he continued to roam over every quarter of the globe, he no longer attempted the work of geographical discovery, nor did the government ever offer him any post in which he could make his mark in history. As British Consul, successively, at Fernando Po on the west coast of Africa, at Santos in Brazil, at Damascus, and at Trieste since 1872, he was virtually shelved while still in the prime of life; nor would official regulations (against which his career was one long protest) allow him an adequate pension when years of travel and toil had at last broken his powerful frame. Granted, that he was never the most humble of subordinates, and perhaps disqualified by temperament for the highest walks of diplomacy or government. Still, when all is said, future generations will wonder, not without shame, that England could find no better mode of utilising the services and honouring the old age of one of her most remarkable sons. To Burton's own credit, it must be remembered that, whatever he felt, no complaints came from him. He took advantage of the freedom of pen permitted to a semi-private position; and he sought his consolation in literature.

For, thus far, we have touched upon only one side of Burton's life. Regarded as a man of action—"adventurer" is the term he would himself have used—he belongs to a class, at no time small in the history of this country, which includes such modern representatives as Livingstone, Gordon, and Stanley. To the fame, however, which he shares with these, Burton added something more than the erudition of a professor and something less than the imagination of a poet—a combination that raises him to a unique rank. His attainments as a mere linguist have, perhaps, been over-rated, because such attainments are rare among Englishmen. Clive never learned Hindustani, nor Gordon Arabic. But his facility in acquiring strange languages first opened to him the pleasures of study, and gave him the ultimate mastery over English. He learnt from men, not from books; and this chiefly in the East, where life is more according to nature, and where words are used to reflect feelings. He was fond of calling himself an anthropologist, by which he meant that he took for his domain everything that concerns man and woman. Whatever humanity does he refused to consider common or unclean; and he dared to write down in black and white (for private circulation) the results of his exceptional experience. Influenced by other motives, he adopted the same methods as Rabelais.

This, again, was but another facet of Burton's many-sided nature, though one which it would be wrong to ignore when estimating his character and life-work. His insatiable curiosity led him to explore almost every path of learning, especially the by-paths. The origins of civilisation, the hoary antiquity of Egypt, prehistoric connexions between the East and the West, the ancient race of the Etruscans, the mysticism of the Sufis, the wanderings of the gypsies, the colonial empire of the Portuguese—these were some of the matters that had a special fascination for him. His cast of mind was so original that not only did he never borrow from anyone else, but he was disposed to resent another's trespassing upon such subjects as he considered his own. But no man could be more cordial in his admiration of honest work done in bordering fields of learning. He was ever ready to assist, from the stores of his experience, young explorers and young scholars; but here, as in all else, he was intolerant of pretentiousness and sciolism. His virility stamped everything he said or wrote. His style was as characteristic as his handwriting. If occasionally marred by the intrusion of alien words and phrases, it always expressed his meaning with force and lucidness, and was capable at times of rising to unlaboured eloquence. And, with Burton, the style was the man. No one could meet him without being convinced of his transparent sincerity. He concealed nothing; he boasted of nothing. Such as circumstances had made him, he bore himself towards all the world: a man of his hands from his youth, a philosopher in his old age; a good hater, but none the less a staunch friend.

So long as the spirit of enterprise animates Englishmen, Burton's exploits will be honoured. So long as genuine literature is appreciated, his name will be preserved by some of his many books. But to those who were admitted to his intimacy, the man himself was greater than what he did or than what he wrote; by them his memory will always be cherished as that of the most vigorous and self-centred personality they have been privileged to know.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

MR. HERBERT SPENCER sends to the current number of Mind an exceedingly interesting postscript to his well-known essay on "The Origin of Music." Since that essay was published, the theory put forward in it—that music had its starting-point in the emotional modifications of speech—has been opposed by more than one writer, among whom the essayist here singles out for response Mr. Darwin and Mr. Edmund Gurney. The former, as is well known, attributed the genesis of music to the utterances of sound by the male animal during courtship, such utterances being improved and fixed by sexual selection. Mr. Spencer now brings forward a number of facts that seem to tell against Darwin's hypothesis, such as the number of animal sounds not connected with the sexual function, the singing of many species of birds at other than the pairing-time; the absence of amatory phonation in the case of the animals having the closest genealogical relation to man, and so forth. He further lays stress on the fact that the songs of the lowest races of mankind are not exclusively or even mainly love-songs, and that what love-songs there are originate rather with the female than with the male. The argument is striking and forcible, but still leaves ample room for the contention that the love passion and the other emotions that are excited along with it furnish one main source of the mysterious influence of music on the feelings. The answer to Mr. Gurney's criticism seems less happy. Mr. Spencer hardly appears to grasp Gurney's whole theory of music; for this ingenious and far-seeing thinker held that the musical faculty is something sui generis, not admitting of analysis or genetic explanation; though he was so far a Darwinian as to allow that much of the emotional effect of music is due to organised associations of tone with the love passions. For the rest, Mr. Spencer hardly succeeds in blunting Gurney's critical rapier. It is not enough to say, in answer to his pertinent objection that musical structure in its simplest forms is marked off by certain distinctive qualities (such as discreteness of tone interval) from emotional speech, that since all evolution is specialisation, we may expect music to take on new differentiating characters. The real point is how a thing with such new structural features could have developed out of feeling-caused modifications of vocalisation. It was just because Mr. Spencer seemed to Gurney to fail in making out any continuity in the developmental process here that Gurney felt bound to call in the aid of his "special faculty" hypothesis; and one cannot see that Mr. Spencer has grappled with this point, the very core of Gurney's doctrine. A word must suffice on the other articles of a particularly good number of the journal. Mr. Sully, in the light of Dr. Ward's Encyclopaedia article, gives a new statement of the process of mental elaboration, and seeks to show how the elementary processes of mental development interact one upon another. Mr. T. Whitaker completes a painstaking sketch of Volkmann's psychological system. Mr. H. W. Orange writes discerningly on Berkeley's position as moral philosopher; and the editor gives a clear summary, not unenriched with valuable hints of possible lines of criticism, of Münsterberg's theory of the muscular sense and the use to which he puts this in his new account of the time sense, a matter dealt with in a recent review of Münsterberg's work in the ACADEMY.

CORRESPONDENCE.

JERUSALEM IN THE TABLETS OF TEL EL-AMARNA.

Queen's College, Oxford: Oct. 20, 1890.

The discovery of despatches from Jerusalem to the kings of Egypt in the fifteenth century B.C., announced in the ACADEMY of last week, throws light on one of the tablets from Tel el-Amarna, belonging to M. Bouriant, which I copied three years ago. The imperfect condition of the tablet prevented me at the time from realising its importance, though I was able to identify in it the names of the cities of Gedor, Gath, Keilah, and Rabbah. But I now see that it also contains a reference to Jerusalem, which is of considerable interest. The passage is as follows: al sad U-ru-sa-lim-KI al bit AN NIN-IP: su-mu Mar-ruv al sar-ri pa-da-ku-at a-sar nisi al Ki-il-ti-KI; that is, "the city of the mountain of Jerusalem, the city of the temple of the god Uras (his) name (there is) Marruv; the city of the king, adjoining (?) the locality of the men of the city of Keilah." Here Jerusalem is distinctly marked out as situated on a mountain, and as being the seat of a famous temple. Marruv seems to represent the Aramaic marē, "lord," and reminds one of the name of Moriah. At all events, we must see in the deity whose temple stood on "the mountain of Jerusalem," the el elyōn, "the most high God," of Gen. xiv. 18.

THE APOLOGY OF ARISTIDES.

Christ's College, Cambridge: Oct. 20, 1890.

In the preface to his recently published collection of Biblical Fragments from Mount Sinai, Prof. Rendel Harris mentions that he has found in the convent of St. Catherine "the Syriac version of the long-lost Apology of Aristides to the Emperor Hadrian on behalf of the Christians."

Owing to the kindness of Mr. Harris, who allowed me to see his proof-sheets, I have been enabled to observe—what indeed the very brief Armenian fragment, translated into Latin, might have suggested to us before this—that the author of "Barlaam and Josaphat" has embodied the principal part of the original Greek text of this ancient Apology as the speech of Nachor in the debate as to the truth of Christianity (Ed. Boissonade, p. 239; Ed. Migne Patr. Gr. 96, col. 1108). After the departure of Barlaam, the monk who has converted the young prince Josaphat, the king thinks to break down the prince's faith by a debate in which Nachor, who impersonates Barlaam, is to be defeated in his sham defence of the new creed.

"Ἐπολαβὸν δὲ ὁ Ναχὼρ . . . ἀνολίξας τὸ στόμα αὐτοῦ, καθάπερ ὁ τοῦ βαλαὰμ υἱος, ὁ οὐ προύθετο εἰπεῖν ταῦτα λελάληκε· καὶ φησὶ πρὸς τὸν βασιλέα· 'Εγὼ, βασιλεῦ, προολίξ Θεοῦ ἦλθον εἰς τὸν κόσμον· καὶ θεωρήσας τὸν οὐρανὸν καὶ γῆν, κ.τ.λ.

It will be seen that this corresponds with the opening words of the Armenian fragment: "Ego, O Rex, Dei providentia creatus, hunc mundum ingressus sum, et caelis terra . . . conspectis," &c. And so in the mouth of Balaam's ass we find the last Apology of Aristides in the original Greek—not indeed the whole of it, nor without many abbreviations and some modifications, as the Syriac will show; but yet very much, and fortunately we can decide exactly how much.

It is hoped that the Apology of Aristides will form one of the first numbers of a new series of "Biblical and Patristic Texts and Studies," to be published in Cambridge shortly after Christmas.

JUNIUS'S TRANSCRIPTS OF OLD-ENGLISH TEXTS.

London: Oct. 21, 1890.

In his last letter on this subject Mr. Logeman begins, after various irrelevant remarks, with apologising for having misquoted me. But he so words his apology as to make the misquotation appear much less serious than it really is.

According to him, the real question at issue is "whether or not Junius's transcripts are generally reliable." But he said himself, in his first letter, that the whole thing began with his rebuking Dr. Murray for attaching importance to the spelling cyrice in Junius's copy of one particular MS. He then distorted my statement about Junius's accuracy in transcribing that MS. into a statement about Junius's method of transcribing certain other MSS. My answer to this was simply to quote my own ungarbled words, and to express my agreement with Mr. Logeman and the rest of the world about the other transcripts.

Mr. Logeman now says, "I have not the slightest reason to assert that this copy is inaccurate." It is rather surprising to find that by "this copy" he means the very transcript which contains the form cyrice against which he had so solemnly warned Dr. Murray! But Mr. Logeman has tried to mislead his readers by making them believe that my conclusions were based on less conclusive grounds than they actually were.

I am afraid that Mr. Logeman has been led into this wretched maze of misquotation, evasion, and self-contradiction by that "cavilling spirit" which he disclaims in his first letter, and that "most amusing passion" which he finds in my objection to having my time wasted. The real meaning of his criticisms evidently is—"Junius and Sweet are regarded as great men; but observe how small, how puny they appear by the side of H. Logeman!"

"COCKNEY."

Sydenham-hill: Oct. 14, 1890.

It seems to me that Mr. Wedgwood could not, when he wrote his note, have seen my note in the ACADEMY of July 5. For he does not even mention my note; and yet his note is little more than an expansion of a suggestion made by me in the last paragraph of the P.S. to my note, and is, like my suggestion, based upon Florio's "cockaneg," which I had already shown, pretty conclusively, to mean an egg just laid and over which the mother's cacklings are still heard. If in my P.S. I did not say more than I did about the connexion which I suggested between "cockaneg" and a hen's cackling, it was, in the first place, because my note was already much too long, and in the second place, and more especially, because I did not see my way quite clearly, and felt difficulties which Mr. Wedgwood either does not feel or has chosen to ignore. One of these difficulties was that Dr. Murray's quotation from Florio, viz., "Cocco . . . delight or glee . . . ; also a cocks egge," shows very clearly to my mind—as it ought to Mr. Wedgwood's also (seeing that after what he has written he can scarcely refuse to allow that the original meaning of cocco is an egg just laid)—that "cock's egg" was sometimes used in former days of an egg just laid. And if this be so, then, in spite of the difficulty of making the coken of "coken-ey" the genitive plural of "cock," the explanation of cockney=cocks' egg can by no means be so summarily dismissed as Mr. Wedgwood would dismiss it.

My second difficulty was the an in "cockaneg" and the en in "cokeney." I did not see how, on account of this syllable, cockan or coken (which Mr. Wedgwood, as well as Dr. Murray, allows to be "practically identical") could possibly be an interjection, as I suppose Mr. Wedgwood would take it to be, unless, indeed, the final syllable were inserted for the sake of euphony, which is not in the least likely. Neither did it seem to me probable that cockan (or coken) was a verb; for, though we find in English a good many instances in which a compound word is made up of a verb followed by a substantive, yet in none of them do we find, I think, any such relation between the verb and the substantive as there would be if we interpreted "cockaneg," an egg which was "cocked" (i.e., cackled) over. Besides which, I doubt whether, even in ancient times, the complete termination en of the infinitive was used when such compound words were formed. I was reduced, therefore, to the supposition that the cockan (or coken) might be a substantive=cocking (with the meaning of "cackling"), the final ng having n substituted for it as is so very common now-a-days; and this suggestion I made in my P.S., and even now I do not see any insurmountable difficulties in it. It would seem that a final ng was frequently pronounced and perhaps even written n, even in ancient times. (See Dr. Murray's note in Notes and Queries, 7th S. ix. 496.) A "cocking egg" might, I fancy, mean an egg with which "cocking" (i.e., cackling) is connected or which gives rise to cackling, just as "cucking-stool" (if it=ducking stool) means a stool which gives rise to cucking=ducking. And that to coken (or coken) may, in middle English, have meant to crow like a cock, is not improbable, seeing that Halliwell gives to "cockle" as used in Cumberland of the crowing of a cock, and that to "cockle" presupposes a verb to "cock," just as to "cackle" presupposes a verb to "cack," the le indicating a frequentative form. But if to coken (or coken) meant to crow like a cock, it may well have meant also, at any rate in children's language, to cackle like a hen; for I endeavoured in my note to show that there is so much similarity between the crowing of a cock and the cackling of a hen that young children might readily confound the two noises, as they were at one time confounded by adults in France when they used the verb coqueter (see Littré) of the two sounds.

My conclusion, accordingly, is that the cockan of "cockaneg" may mean either "cocks," or "cocking" (=cackling), or may, perhaps, contain more or less of both meanings, which, after all, are not so very dissimilar, seeing that it is agreed on all hands that a cock is so named from the noise he makes. Prof. Max Müller's Cuck-ei is certainly in favour of the second view, which is, no doubt, the preferable one so far as meaning is concerned; but the Cuck is evidently an interjection, and can the same be said of cockan or coken? But as for the "baa-lamb" and "moo-cow" quoted by Mr. Wedgwood as analogous, and the Hotto-pferd, Motsche-Kuh, and Mietze-Katze cited by Prof. Max Müller, there is really no analogy whatever; for in every case the first part of the compound words, whether it be an interjection or a verb, expresses a sound made by the second part; whereas in "cockaneg" it is not the egg which cackles, but the hen, who is not mentioned. If cockan (or coken) is a genitive plural=of cocks, there is a difficulty, no doubt; but will Mr. Wedgwood kindly show that the difficulty is less if these words are taken to express the cackling of a hen? He calls it clucking, but I have never heard clucking applied to the noise made by a hen when it lays an egg.

In conclusion, it is interesting to note that all across Central Africa "chicken=kuku, kokko, ngokko, bukoko" (Stanley, In Darkest Africa, ii. 442.)

This note would have been written long ago if I had been at home to write it.

BACON AND WOTTON.

Coomb Vicarage, near Woodstock: Oct. 8, 1890.

I would supplement the "Illustrative Notes" in Mr. S. H. Reynolds's edition of Bacon's Essays, just published by the Oxford University Press.

In Essay VI. ("Of Simulation and Dissimulation"), Bacon writes thus:

" . . . the discovery of a man's self by the tracts of his countenance is a great weakness and betraying."

Contrast what had the approval of Bacon's contemporary, Sir Henry Wotton. The following is in Reliquiae Wottonianae (4th edit., 1685, pp. 342-344):

"To Mr. MILTON.

"Sir, . . . At Sienna [sic] I was tabled in the House of one Alberto Scipioni, an Old Roman Courtier in dangerous times, having been Steward to the Duca di Pagliano, who with all his Family were strangled, save the only Man that escaped by fore-sight of the Tempest; with him I had often much chat of those Affairs; into which he took Pleasure to look back from his Native Harbour, and at my departure toward Rome (which had been the Center of his Experience) I had won Confidence enough to beg his advice, how I might carry myself securely there, without Offence of others, or of mine own Conscience. Signor Arrigo mio (says he), I Pensieri stretti, & il viso sciolto: That is, your thoughts close, and your Countenance loose, will go safely over the whole World. Of which Delphian Oracle (for so I have found it) your judgment doth need no Commentary; and therefore, Sir, I will commit you with it to the best of all securities, God's dear love, remaining

"Your Friend as much at Command,

"as any of longer date,

"H. WOTTON."

The same thing appears in pp. 356-357 thus:

"Worthy Sir, . . . Sorry I was not to be at Eton when Mr. B. your Nephew, and my Friend, came thither to visit me, being then in prociect of his Travels: But I had some good while before, at another kind visitation, together with your Sons and Mr. S., giving him a Catholick Rule which was given me long since by an old Roman Courtier with whom I tabled in Sienna [sic], and whose Counsels I begged for the Government of my self at my departure from him towards the foresaid Court, where he had been so well versed. Signor Arrigo (says he) There is one short remembrance will carry you safe through the whole World. I was glad to hear such a preservative contracted into so little room, and so besought him to honor me with it. Nothing but this (saith he) Gi Pensiere [sic] stretti [sic], & il viso sciolto: That is, as I use to translate it, Your Thoughts close, and your Countenance loose. This was that Moral Antidote which I imparted to Mr. B. and his Fellow-Travellers, when they were last with me, having a particular Interest in their well-doings, both as they are yours, and as they have had some training under my poor Regiment. . . .

"At your Commands,

THE DERIVATION OF "YES TOR."

Williton, Somerset: Oct. 21, 1890.

In the ACADEMY of February 1, Mr. Walter J. Purton, alluding to the attempted derivation of "Yes Tor" in my book on Dartmoor and its Antiquities, suggested that the name was a contraction of Highest Tor. I have long thought that this derivation was, to say the least, extremely plausible, and a "note" to the Rev. H. G. Fothergill's copy of Bridges's Account of the Barony and Town of Okehampton goes very far to support Mr. Purton's theory. Mr. Fothergill does not say whence he obtained this "note"; but, judging from the language, it appears to have formed part of a survey of the Okehampton Commons, though, as the annotation says, it "by no means agrees with the Perambulation of the Boundaries of Dartmoor Forest A.D. 1240, or that of 1609." The "note" as quoted here is from a new edition of Bridges, edited by Mr. W. H. K. Wright; and the bounds run from the summit of "Middle Tor alias Milltor. . . lineally to the Top or highest part of Eastor alias Highest Tor."

With regard to "Yelland," I do not think with him that it is to be sought for in Higher Land but in Yeo Land. Yeo is a very common surname—and river name—in Devonshire.

THE "POUND OF FLESH" STORY.

Boston, Mass.: Oct. 9, 1890.

Having been absent, the ACADEMY for September 13 has only just come to my hand. Mr. Clouston, who there continues his interesting notes on versions of the Bond story and the pound of flesh, may like to know that I pointed out its existence in the Cursor Mundi in 1875, when at work on that poem for the Early English Text Society. The paper dealing with this, and referring (albeit imperfectly) to many other versions of the story, including those in Dolopathos and Harl. MS. 7322, will be found in the New Shakspeare Society's Transactions, Part I.

TWO BOOKS ON VOLCANOES.

Characteristics of Volcanoes. With Contributions of Facts and Principles from the Hawaiian Islands. By James D. Dana. (Sampson Low.)

Mount Vesuvius: a Descriptive, Historical, and Geological Account of the Volcano and its Surroundings. By J. Logan Lobley. (Roper & Drowley.)

It has too often been rashly assumed that volcanoes all the world over must of necessity be modelled after the familiar type of Vesuvius. As a matter of fact, there are certain volcanoes which, in consequence of the extreme liquidity of their lavas, differ widely from the Vesuvian pattern; the difference being not confined to the general form and features of the mountain, but extending to the mode in which the fiery activities are usually manifested. Of these exceptional volcanoes, the best examples are to be found in the Sandwich Islands, and hence it may be convenient to distinguish them as the Hawaiian type. The two works under review serve admirably to illustrate and contrast these two classes of volcanoes; for while Prof. Lobley confines himself exclusively and necessarily to the Vesuvian type, Prof. Dana presents us, in his new work, with the best scientific description which we possess of the curious volcanoes of the Hawaiian Islands. It is true the leading title of the American treatise is suggestively comprehensive; but the reader will find that the general part, dealing with the "Characteristics of Volcanoes," occupies only twenty-four pages out of about 400, while the bulk of the book is devoted to a detailed account of the eruptive centres in the Sandwich archipelago.

Exactly half a century has slipped by since Mr. Dana, then a young naturalist in the scientific corps of the exploring expedition under the command of Capt. Wilkes, first set foot on the volcanic soil of Hawaii. Up to that date little or nothing had been written by any scientific authority on the subject of Hawaiian volcanoes, and hence Prof. Dana's admirable descriptions in the Geological Report of the Expedition, and those of Wilkes, were stamped with peculiar value. Dana's Report, published forty-one years ago (not fifty-one, as stated in the Preface) is now so difficult to procure that its reproduction would have been acceptable to students of vulcanology. But the venerable professor has done much better than reproduce his early work. In his new volume, while freely using the original Report, he has embodied the results of a second visit to the Hawaiian Islands made so recently as 1887—a visit which illustrates in a remarkable manner the unflagging nature of his enthusiasm. Most men at his time of life would have shrunk from undertaking a journey of some ten thousand miles in order to clear up a few scientific points; but Prof. Dana is endowed with exceptional vigour, and the reader who turns over the pages of his new work will be struck with the intellectual freshness with which he still attacks the obscure problems of vulcanicity.

The visitor to Hawaii finds two enormous centres of activity, known as Mauna Loa and Kilauea, which, though some twenty miles apart, are yet within the area of a single mountain dome. As these two fiery neighbours are usually quite unsympathetic in their eruptive activities, and as one is nearly ten thousand feet above the level of the other, it seems but reasonable to suppose that they are independent foci; and such, in fact, is the view entertained by several able writers. Prof. Dana, however, has always argued in favour of their dependence, regarding Kilauea as an appendage to Mouna Loa—a view which, it must be admitted, receives strong support from the recent petrographical studies of Prof. E. S. Dana, the author's son, who finds that the lavas of the two craters are so similar in constitution as to suggest that they have taken their origin in a common source.

The Hawaiian lavas belong to the typically basaltic class, and are therefore extremely fusible. It is not an uncommon notion with students that the fusibility of a rock bears a distinct relation to its basicity; but Prof. Dana pertinently reminds the reader that anorthite, the most basic of the feldspars, is not more fusible than orthoclase, the most acid of the group, while olivine, the ultra-basic constituent of lavas, is practically infusible. The basalts of Hawaii melt easily enough, not because they are basic, but because their chief constituents, labradorite and augite, happen to be freely fusible. Probably, a temperature of 2,000° F., or little more, is sufficient to effect their liquefaction, and this temperature is readily obtained beneath the craters of Hawaii. The lavas, therefore, so far from being viscid or pasty, as is often the case with trachytic lavas, are perfectly mobile, flowing freely and running with great velocity; hence they come to rest at a very low angle, and, indeed, the usual slopes of the Hawaiian lava-flows are only from one to ten degrees. A characteristic feature of these mountains is the comparative flatness of their profile, markedly different from the steep-sided conical shape of most volcanoes. The crater, too, is peculiar, in that it takes the form of a huge broad pit, with vertical walls of stratified lava-flows, but not encircled by any acute terminal cone. In fact, Capt. Dutton suggested some years ago that this type of crater being distinctive should be distinguished as a "caldera." The lava-surface at the bottom of the pit-crater, when solidified into a hard floor, forms a broad flat expanse, with here and there, perhaps, a glowing lake of lava, like a huge bath of molten metal, red-hot, or even yellow-hot. So mobile is this liquid that a slight projectile force may toss it up into fiery sprays, which, playing rapidly on the surface, produce a dazzling effect, once described by a sober naturalist as "a network of lightning." At times of great eruptive activity, such jets may be thrown up from the boiling surface to a height of hundreds of yards. Yet the eruptions are usually so harmless that the observer may stand on the very verge of the crater and watch with impunity the illuminated fountains and the huge jets of steam escaping from the fiery billows. In fact, phenomena which in other countries are regarded with terror are here looked upon as a grand spectacle, which the natives watch with as little fear as though it were a display of fireworks. When the pent-up forces find relief by the peaceful discharge of lava, the floor of the crater, undermined by loss of material, gradually sinks, apparently following a subsiding column of lava; and at last the hard bottom of the pit may present no sign of volcanic activity save in the fleecy vapours which issue largely from its cracks and crannies.

Under the native names of pahoehoe and aa, two kinds of lava-streams are recognised in Hawaii—the former being distinguished by its smooth surface, though the mass of the lava is itself wrinkled and twisted, while the latter is made up of detached masses of irregular size and shape, piled together in the utmost confusion. An interesting feature in some of the lava-flows is the occurrence of large caverns, the walls and roof of which are sometimes bedecked with crowds of stalactites, slender it may be as a pipe-stem, yet curiously twisted and gnarled, while the floor beneath is covered with volcanic stalagmite. It appears that the stalactitic pendants are not formed, as might naturally be supposed, by the simple drip of a viscous lava, but are the result of a secondary action, which the author rather curiously terms "the recrystallising of basalt," in other words, the component minerals of the basaltic lava have recrystallised, so that the stalactites exhibit crystals of augite, labradorite, and magnetite. Prof. E. S. Dana contributes a valuable account of these formations; and though his explanation is not, as he admits, thoroughly satisfactory, he is disposed to explain their formation by a kind of solfataric action, whereby the lava, under the influence of superheated steam, has undergone an aqueo-fusion, allowing the constituent minerals freedom to crystallise afresh.

It is a far cry from the heart of the Pacific Ocean to the shores of the Bay of Naples; but it is worth while after studying the volcanoes of Hawaii to turn to Vesuvius and mark how striking the contrast. Vesuvius is a volcano of the common cone-and-crater type; its eruptions are usually of an explosive character; the ejected materials are in large measure cinders and ashes, which form steep-sided mounds, and the lavas are only of moderate fusibility. To anyone desirous of thoroughly studying Vesuvius and its products Prof. Lobley's volume may be recommended with confidence. In the spring of 1868 the author ascended the mountain during a rather violent eruption, and on his return published an account of the ascent in a small work on Vesuvius. Twenty-one years afterwards he has republished this work in a revised and expanded form—so greatly expanded, in fact, that the handsome volume before us may be regarded for all practical purposes as a new work. In writing this volume, the author has availed himself of the copious literature on Vesuvius which has grown up in recent years, special attention being properly directed to the writings of Dr. Johnston-Lavis and of Prof. Palmieri, who, as scientific observers constantly on the spot, have watched and recorded the varying phases of its activity with a minuteness unknown before their time.

After reviewing the numerous hypotheses which have been advanced by geologists and physicists to explain the phenomena of vulcanicity, Prof. Lobley finds himself—like many other thoughtful people—unable to accept any one of them as thoroughly satisfactory. He is therefore bold enough to advance one himself. It is not easy to expound this theory in a few words; nor is there much need to attempt an exposition, since it has been submitted to the scientific world elsewhere, while the curious reader who is not familiar with it may be referred to the pages of the author, where he will find the general subject of vulcanicity treated with much fullness.

To many readers, Prof. Lobley's volume would probably have been more welcome if it had been less full. In a laudable desire to deal thoroughly with his subject he has been led to introduce details which might have been omitted without much detriment, we believe, to the general interest of his work. Thus, the illustrations of the six systems of crystals were hardly needed, especially as some of the figures are by no means satisfactory. But if the volume is not exactly the book a tourist will care to carry with him, it is undoubtedly a book extremely useful for reference at home. For Prof. Lobley may be commended as an attractive and trustworthy writer, whether he is dealing with Vesuvius in its historical or topographical, its geological or botanical aspect.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTES ON PĀLI AND PRĀKRIT.

48, Wellington-road, Dublin: Oct. 10, 1890.

✓ "cagh" of the Aśoka Inscriptions.

This root occurs in (a) the Delhi columnar edict (iv. 10, 11) and in the detached edicts at (b) Dhauri (i. 19, ii. 11) and (c) Jaugada (ii. 16). The Delhi passages are:

- "(a), (1) yēna main lajūkā caghainti ālādhayitavē.
(2) viyatadhāti caghati mē pajam sukham palihatavē."

The Dhauri and Jaugada passages are all nearly word for word the same. The first runs:

- "(b), (1) hēvam ca kalaintam tūphē caghattha saimpapādayitavē."

The general meaning of all the passages is clear. ✓ Cagh must have some such meaning as "striving," "endeavouring," followed by a dative of a verbal noun. We may render a, 1 by "so that my officers may set themselves to please me"; a, 2 by "a skilful nurse sets herself to care for the happiness of my child"; and b, 1 by "and acting thus, set ye yourselves to cause (the people) to walk (in the Good Way)." The exact original meaning of the word, and its equivalent in Sanskrit, remain, however, still subject to doubt. M. Senart's proposal to connect it with jāgrati is admittedly conjectural. There is a very common root cagh in the Chattisgarhi dialect of Bihārī. It means "to rise," "to ascend." I derive this from the Sanskrit uccarghati (Prākṛit uccagghati), with loss of the initial u (a very frequent occurrence). The Sanskrit root cargh, "to go, to move," is given in Wilson's Dictionary, but is omitted from the St. Petersburg Wörterbuch, probably for want of authority. This authority is now supplied in the Chattisgarhi dialectal form. Piyadasi's ✓ cagh, with a dative of a verbal noun, therefore means to go to, and hence, metaphorically, to set oneself to, to "go for" a thing.

The Character read "kya" in the Aśoka Inscriptions.

This character has excited considerable controversy. It is admittedly a compound of the sign for k and the sign for y, and, graphically, it represents kya. In the Khālsī inscription it is substituted (but by no means uniformly) for the k which we should expect in the termination ikā; and it also occurs in the foreign word alikyasadala. It is also found twice in the Delhi columnar inscription. All scholars agree that no completely satisfactory explanation has been given for this form. It seems to me that the following is not unreasonable.

The spelling of Piyadasi's inscriptions presents several instances of false analogy. M. Senart has given strong reasons for believing that when Piyadasi at Gīrnar wrote st, he meant to represent the sound tth. It was a mistaken attempt to revive an old-fashioned spelling. The scribe knew that Sanskrit śt became tth in Prākṛit, and hence wrongly assumed that every Prākṛit tth was derived from śt. Therefore, to show his learning, whenever he came to a tth, he wrote it st, even in cases when tth represented not śt, but śth.

I think that this ikyā is a similar instance of false analogy. The Māgadhī Prākṛit termination ikā is liable to have its penultimate vowel lengthened, thus, ikā. Then, by a well-known rule, the i can again be shortened, the consonant following being at the same time doubled in compensation, thus, ikkā. Instances of this are not uncommon in literature; and, judging from the modern languages of India, must have been extremely common in conversation. Prākṛit examples will be found in §203 of Dr. Hoernle's Gaudian Grammar, and I need not quote them here. As the Khālsī and the Delhi inscriptions were written in Piyadasi's Māgadhī dialect, we need not be surprised if we find this doubling occurring in them too.

Now Sanskrit ikyā does become ikkā in Prākṛit; and I believe that the scribe, coming upon an ikkā with a totally different derivation of which he was ignorant, and wishing to show his learning, represented that ikkā also by ikyā, just as his brother at Gīrnar represented tth by st, even when it had nothing whatever to do with that compound. If we assume, as suggested by M. Senart, that the scribe endeavoured to connect the foreign word Alikyasadala with the Sanskrit alika (an instance of a common kind of word-play in Sanskrit literature), we find an additional confirmation of my suggestion. The i in alika is long; its being shortened shows that the word must have been pronounced alikka in Piyadasi's time. Accordingly, the engraver, coming upon another kk, followed his custom and wrote it kya.

It will be observed that this accounts for the want of uniformity with which kya appears in Piyadasi's inscriptions. M. Senart shows that at Khālsī ikyā occurs seventeen and ikā seven times. At Delhi there are only two instances of ikyā, ikā being used everywhere else. So, also, in Māgadhī Prākṛit both the terminations ikkā and ikā appear to have been concurrently and indifferently used, just as at the present day a man of Magadha will say in the same breath, chotakā and chotakkā, tanikā and tanikkā, tanukā and tanukkā.

Ichā and īpsā.

If, in the following, I am telling a twice-told tale, I can only express my regret. We all know that Sanskrit icchā, a "wish," and its relations, are universally referred to the root ish. Are we, however, certainly right in thus connecting the root and the base? Ichā appears to me to be an old Prākṛit form of īpsā, "desire to obtain," adopted into Sanskrit from the earliest times. The base icch and the base īps are both very old. The former occurs in the R̥g, and the latter in the Atharva Vēda. Ps regularly becomes cch in Prākṛit; and icch may be really a secondary form of īps, borrowed as a base for the conjugational tenses of ish, though of independent origin. There is nothing impossible in this, and the concurrent existence of īps in exactly the same meaning makes it probable.

SCIENCE NOTES.

The following are the changes which are proposed to be made in the council of the London Mathematical Society for the session 1890-91. Prof. Greenhill to be president, Dr. Larmor, Major MacMahon, and Mr. J. J. Walker, vice-presidents. The retiring members are Prof. Burnside, Prof. Cayley, and Sir James Cockle; and in their room the present council have nominated Dr. Hirst, Mr. Lachlan, and Mr. Love. The election will take place on November 13. On the same occasion the retiring president (Mr. J. J. Walker) will deliver his address on "The Influence of Applied on the Progress of Pure Mathematics," and will also present to Lord Rayleigh the De Morgan medal, which was awarded him by the council in June last for his writings on physical subjects.

THE June number of the Journal of the Straits Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society (London: Kegan Paul & Co.) is mainly devoted to natural history. The longest paper is the conclusion of Mr. W. H. Treacher's elaborate description of British Borneo, which deals not only with the territory of the Company, but also with Labuan (recently placed under the Company's administration), with Sarawak, and with Brunai or Brunei (which Raja Brooke has recently annexed). Mr. Treacher deals in an exhaustive manner with the history of the country, its population, its natural products, and its probable future under British rule. We are not aware that any other account, alike so full and so trustworthy, is in existence. Mr. L. Wray, junior, curator of the Perak Museum, describes a collecting expedition which he made in the hills of Batang Padang from June to November, 1888; and Mr. R. Bowdler Sharpe, of the British Museum, writes upon the birds obtained on this occasion. He points out that the chief result is to extend the Avifauna of Tenasserim, and even of the Himalaya, much further south than had before been suspected. Finally, M. L. C. Isnard, a French mining engineer, reports very favourably upon the prospects of finding gold in Gemenchek, one of the Malay States which make up the confederation of Negri Sembilan, under British protection.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

At a recent meeting of the Académie des Inscriptions, M. Bréal read a paper upon "The Connexion between the Etruscan and the Latin Alphabet." The Etruscan alphabet, as is well known, is identical with the Greek alphabet, with the omission of a certain number of letters representing sounds that were foreign to Etruscan phonetics. It was this alphabet, according to M. Bréal, which was adopted by the Latins and the other Italic peoples—the Osci and Umbrians. At a later date the Latins perceived the deficiencies of an alphabet which had not been constructed for them, and sought for a remedy. This they found by borrowing the missing letters from the Greek alphabet. But this subsequent incorporation has left traces which afford the explanation of certain inconsistencies. M. Boissier raised objections to M. Bréal's theory. The Latin alphabet does not differ from the Etruscan only by having four additional letters, borrowed from the Greek; it also differs by not having four letters which the Etruscan has, and by having one differently formed. Is it conceivable that the influence of the Greek grammarians was so strong as to make the Romans abandon these four Etruscan letters? In M. Boissier's judgment the view of Prof. Kirchhoff and Prof. Mommsen, which derives the Latin alphabet from that used by the Greeks of Cumæ and Naples, remains the most reasonable. At a subsequent meeting, M. Bréal read a paper upon the pronunciation of c in Latin. The majority of philologists maintain that c in Latin preserved the sound of k, even before the vowels e and i, down to the close of antiquity. M. Bréal contested this view; and he adduced reasons for believing that at a comparatively early date the pronunciation of c before e and i was modified to a sound intermediate between k and the Italian ci. M. Deloche called to mind that, in a paper read before the Académie, he has described a Gaulish vase of the age of Justinian, bearing an inscription with the word officina written OFIKINA. M. Bréal, however, was disposed to see in this only a mistake of the writer; for in the time of Justinian the syllable ci was certainly not pronounced as ki.

Geschichte des Sprachwissenschaft bei den Griechen und Römern. By H. Steinthal. Second Edition. Part I. (Berlin: Dümmler.) Prof. Steinthal's history of philology among the Greeks and Romans is too well known to require description. For many years it has been the indispensable companion of the student of language; and it is a matter of astonishment that a second edition of it should not have appeared until now. Little has been changed in the first part of the work. The author promises more important alterations in the second part. A tone of sadness pervades the preface; he describes himself as growing old and forced to leave to a younger generation the completion of that general history of linguistic science which he had once planned. We wonder whether the younger generation will produce any bold or learned enough to carry out a task which has proved too vast for "the giants" who are passing away. The latter half of Prof. Steinthal's preface is devoted to tracing the origin of the term "Indo-German," the inventor of which he finds in a certain Friedrich Schmitthenner of Frankfurt, who used the expression "indisch-deutsch" in his Ursprachelehre published in 1826. Five years later the expression had become "indo-germanisch" in the tenth edition of the Hebrew grammar of Gesenius.

FINE ART.

THE PASTELS AT THE GROSVENOR GALLERY.

ONE would not be sorry to exchange the big show of pastels at the Grosvenor Gallery—meritorious as that is in many ways—for a much scantier gathering. If one could have, for instance, in place of this somewhat overwhelming assemblage, produced a great deal of it in obedience to, or in expectation of, a commercial demand—if one could have, instead of that, just a score of works by the few who in the French art of the second half of the eighteenth century, understood pastel best—if one could have Latour, Rosalba, Chardin!

Quantity, however, rather than quality, has to be accepted, for the most part, in the modern exhibition. We have much that is fruitlessly ambitious, much that is feeble, much that is bad. Along with it, however, there are works that are good—works indeed which, if not relatively numerous, are at least actually so. To these we will pretty much confine ourselves; and we will begin with M. Blanche, the eminent Frenchman. M. Blanche sends to the Grosvenor Gallery three noticeable and admirable things. A certain refinement in realism is shown in his child's head, which is called "Study of a Head for Stained Glass" (No. 18). Not often before, except by quite the greatest painters, has an exceedingly plain child been made so distinctly interesting. Absolutely without formal beauty, the thoughtful débile face has the charm of a past written clearly upon it. An intensity of life—though by no means life of a pretty kind—is conveyed into the portrait of a certain "Madame A. H." (No. 2); and the third contribution of M. Blanche which demands to be inspected is his finely drawn portrait of Madame Bord-Penès, seated in evening dress and making music at her piano. Mdlle. Belinska is another foreigner of position, whose work attracts notice now by its genuine cleverness, now by the mere harshness and brutality of its presentation of a nature with which no reasonable person would desire to become acquainted. "Jeune Fille à la Fenêtre" (No. 185), with its breadth and its fine qualities of illumination, is an instance of her wiser, and "Jeune Femme, vue de dos" (No. 304) an instance of her less well-directed labour. The latter pastel lacks entirely the "lustre, opalescence, subtlety," without which the rendering of the nude can rarely be satisfactory. It is true that Mr. Albert Moore's semi-nude subject, called "A Bathing Place" (No. 68), has not all those qualities; but it is done with different aims from those of Mdlle. Belinska. It is to be above all things harmonious and decorative; and, since it is the work of Mr. Albert Moore, it can hardly be deficient in refinement and grace. Very able is Mr. Solomon Solomon's "Study" (No. 148), in which a woman with lowered arm balances herself to adjust a sandal on an uplifted foot. One of the modern costumed figures in M. Fernand Khnopff's large contribution (No. 89) is fine in type, in drawing, and in tone. This is a lawn-tennis player; her companions are in no sense her serious rivals.

Originality of vision is represented by, among others, Mr. William Stott, of Oldham; and the very reverse of originality of vision—along, however, with some truth of sentiment, and singular deftness of hand—is displayed, as usual, in the work of Mr. George Clausen. We all of us owe much to this or that predecessor—to this or that impressive master—whatever our arts may be; but with most men of ability there is some limit to the debt—a limit recognisable, and some distinct possession of the man's own. But where—the student of contemporary art may fairly ask—would Mr. George Clausen have been, if Jean François Millet and Bastien-Lepage had never existed? And the student may be inclined to add that in that case Mr. Clausen would never have been heard of. I am not altogether of that opinion. I see in this highly skilled and impressionable artist not the inevitable imitator of any particular person, but the inevitable follower of somebody whom he respects. Of course the extent to which he follows must remain, and must always have remained, a barrier to our accepting with full heartiness work that is unquestionably sincere, and that on one side of it, at any rate, is technically so good. I have said that as regards influence, marked influence, from without, Mr. William Stott, of Oldham, is exactly the opposite of Mr. Clausen. He has a charming portrait of a boy among these new pastels, a portrait of the utmost frankness and of the truest character. He has at least a couple of exquisite suggestions of high Alpine scenery—"Sapphire Glacier" (No. 39) and "Fischerhorn" (No. 42). They are not near to making the mistake of being coldly realistic. Like Mr. Albert Goodwin's—though by what different methods—they are essentially poetic. They are not a chart for the simple; a treatise for the ignorant—they are just a word to the wise. There are contributions of Mr. Sichel which, in their own way, are not at all less poetic, though I do not for my own part find that they are quite so original. "A Child's Funeral in the Highlands" (No. 78) has genuine sentiment; but was not the medium a mistake? Elsewhere is Mr. Sichel more charming. Mr. Aumonier has one very subtle and refined landscape. Mr. Arthur Melville—the splendid colour of whose "Audrey" we are not likely to forget—is this time chiefly prosaic and clever. A sortie de théâtre affords much further opportunities of kaleidoscopic movement and picturesque line than he has yet displayed in it. Let him, with all his natural and acquired ability, learn something from a by-past art. Let him absorb a little of the grace of the distinction of the "Sortie de l'Opera" of Moreau le jeune.

Mr. J. J. Shannon has a smart, good portrait of himself, and a portrait of a lady which I like less. In "Pierrette Incroyable" Miss Ethel Wright treats somebody who is an interesting subject brilliantly, and I am informed that it is herself. Mr. Tofano's portrait of Mrs. Holdsworth, backed by a rose-coloured or a lobster-coloured blind, is a noticeable and admirable performance. A fitting theme for pastel is that which has been chosen by Mr. Guthrie, and skilfully treated by him—firelight in an interior. Mr. Wilson Steer always ends by interesting one. He interests us in the "Girl Sewing." He interests us in "The Sprigged Frock." From a modernité so bold and unsparing as his, the transition is complete indeed to Mr. C. H. Shannon's women and marigolds—he ignores the women in his title; they are only so much "line." Mr. Peppercorn, Mr. Christie, Mr. McClure Hamilton, Mr. J. S. Hill, Mrs. Jopling, Miss Maud Coleridge, Miss Gertrude May, are all them contributors whose work deserves more than a glance. Mr. Ellis Roberts's "Lady Alice Shaw Stewart" is a refined portrait in dainty profile. A quite good likeness of Mr. Colvin comes to us from Mr. Macpherson; and Mr. Herbert Vos, in his portrait of at least one child, makes amends for the unmitigated prosiness of his other able but scarcely welcome contributions.

FREDERICK WEDMORE.

A DAVID COX EXHIBITION AT BIRMINGHAM.

VISITORS to Birmingham during the first week in November, for the annual congress of the National Association for the Advancement of Art, will have an opportunity of seeing an exhibition of unusual merit and extent. Mr. Whitworth Wallis, F.S.A., the director of the Birmingham Museum and Art Gallery, is arranging a collection of works by David Cox. Over four hundred and fifty examples of this great artist's various periods have been got together, thanks to the generosity and hearty co-operation of the principal owners of his works; and the exhibition will surpass all others that have hitherto been seen. Many of these pictures and drawings have never before been exhibited in public, so that the opportunity for a thorough examination of so many of his masterpieces by all true lovers of English water-colour art will be a great one—and a rare one, too, as it will be hardly possible in the future to bring together again so representative a collection. Mr. James Orrock has placed the whole of his famous collection at Mr. Wallis's disposal, and Mr. Holbrook Gaskell has done the same. Over twenty works are from the collection of the late Mr. Enoch Harvey. The Betts family, of Birmingham, are lending fifty examples, including a series of sepia drawings, which have never yet been exhibited. A very interesting contribution comes from Lord Willoughby de Eresby—the famous sign-board from the Royal Oak Hotel, Bettws-y-coed, which was the subject of a lawsuit some time ago. Among the other contributors may be mentioned Lord Armstrong, Sir William H. Houldsworth, Mr. James Houldsworth of Coltness, Mr. Cuthbert Quilter, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, Mr. William Kenrick, Dr. T. W. Jex-Blake, the South Kensington Museum, Mr. Philip H. Rathbone, Mr. William Agnew, Mr. Louis Huth, Mr. C. T. Jacoby, Mr. J. E. Taylor, Mr. A. T. Hollingsworth, Mr. Lewis Powell, and Mr. J. Broughton Dugdale.

CORRESPONDENCE.

BURMESE LEADEN COINS.

West Kirby: Oct. 20, 1890.

Captain Temple is rather hard on poor King Thibaw. His procedure for reducing his civil list may not have been in accordance with his education under the missionaries; but if he is guilty of the enormity of coining in lead, at least he did not continue his predecessor's practice. My leaden coins (weight 201 grains) are all dated 1231 = A.D. 1869; and as I brought them from Rangoon in 1870, there can be no doubt of their being anterior to the reign of the last of the Burmese kings. I have only half-a-dozen of them, survivors of many more—indeed, of a parcel so large that it perhaps accounts for the disappearance of that coinage of lead. Mr. Fowle, Siamese Consul at Rangoon, had been telling me of the leaden coins of Upper Burma; and I, supposing that they were remains of bygone times, said I would like to assay some and see whether the lead contained much silver. This was sufficient for the kindness and enthusiasm of Mr. Fowle; he sent up to Mandalay for some. His agent there over-zealously swept the bazaar of every leaden coin that could be got, and there soon arrived a case containing a couple of hundred-weight of the ponderous, but not very valuable, coins. I suppose they never returned to Mandalay, but got cast into bullets. I may mention that these coins are otherwise according to Captain Temple's description, with the hare on one side and a wreathed inscription on the other.

EDWARD NICHOLSON.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

MESSRS. ARTHUR TOOTH & SONS and Mr. Thomas McLean will open contemporaneously, as usual, their annual winter exhibitions next door to each other in the Haymarket. Messrs. Tooth announce, as their special attraction, Mr. Alma Tadema's latest picture, "The Promise of Spring."

A ROOM at the National Gallery newly devoted to Turner's work displays a further and most interesting instalment of the drawings of the greatest landscape painter. There are, it seems, over a hundred freshly exhibited, and they are of all periods. A great proportion consists naturally of the unfinished sketches of his later time, and only a small proportion of the immature or more prosaic work of his earlier days. There is, as yet, no catalogue of the subjects, and it seems uncertain whether one can be conveniently provided; for, of course, many of the themes are, and must remain, unrecognisable. It is possible, however, to make very shrewd guesses—and in some cases more than guesses—as to certain of the spots which in their idealised aspects the master desired to represent. A "Dunstanborough," unlike the Liber subject, is hardly one of the finest drawings. Very interesting is a large drawing, in full colour, of another and a much-esteemed Liber subject, the "Inverary Pier: Loch Fyne: Morning." A large proportion of the drawings—of the later and more poetic sketches, especially—are of foreign scenes. Such are the charming dream of the towers of Lausanne and the noble little vision of a town set on a cliff, which, it has been pointed out, can hardly be other than the Swiss Fribourg.

MR. DUNTHORNE proposes to hold in the season a complete exhibition of the work of Mr. Frank Short, whose latest and not least delightful addition to his translations of other men's paintings is a most delicate mezzotint after a sketch of Constable's in the possession of Mr. Henry Vaughan.

MESSRS. DOWDESWELL will open, on November 1, an exhibition of pictures of Scottish Highland cattle by Mr. J. Denovan Adam.

THE eleventh annual report of the Archaeological Institute of America records the establishment during the past year of four branch societies—all in the West—at Chicago, Detroit, Minneapolis, and Madison. The result of the appeal for subscriptions towards the excavation of Delphi is disappointing. It was estimated that the sum of 75,000 dollars (£15,000) is required for purchasing the site; but of this, only 30,000 dollars has been promised, almost entirely from Boston. At the end of the report is printed a useful statement of the work of the Imperial German Archaeological Institute, with a list of its publications.

THE STAGE.

STAGE NOTES.

THE Court Theatre has re-opened its doors with continued representations of Mr. Pinero's "Cabinet Minister," by the same caste, for the most part, as that engaged in the earlier performances.

THE Grand Theatre at Islington, though suburban as to locality, is often truly metropolitan in the nature of its entertainments. We have pointed out before that there are occasions when it has every advantage except that of situation. Next week Mr. Leslie and Miss Nellie Farren, with that detachment of the Gaiety company that is wont to accompany them—and which is allowed to be at least as important as the detachment left behind in the Strand—will appear at Islington before they proceed to America. And this week the remote playhouse of which we speak has been the means of giving Londoners an opportunity of seeing Miss Fortescue as Juliet. The performance is esteemed to be the strongest of any in which the lady has yet engaged. Miss Fortescue has been able, in an unusual measure, to look and to act the most inevitably fascinating of all Shaksperian heroines.

MR. G. BERNARD SHAW read before the Church and Stage Guild, at 31 Upper Bedford-place, on Monday last, a paper which was practically on the gospel of Ibsen as it unfolds itself throughout his long series of plays. The stories of the plays were so told by Mr. Shaw that their "spirit"—or, at all events, that which the lecturer deemed to be their spirit—was enabled to "shine through" the narration. In a way that was at once instructive and entertaining, lucid and "subversive," Mr. Shaw unfolded the message of a writer whom the Fabian Society apparently delights to honour, and whom the Church and Stage Guild may naturally be interested in hearing of. Church and Stage were both of them, of course, represented at the meeting—the ecclesiastical element rather predominating; and Mr. Bernard Shaw, in the most sweet-natured of fashions, said the most shocking and hazardous things about both. As an exposition and interpretation of Ibsen, from a definitely chosen point of view, we should be glad to see the paper printed, that we might read it at leisure.

MUSIC.

THE NORWICH FESTIVAL.

(Second Notice.)

LAST week we were only able to record the fact that Dr. Mackenzie's incidental music to "Ravenswood" had been successfully performed. The Prelude, with its weird and gloomy strains foretelling the doom of the house of Ravenswood, and its various themes connected with the dramatis personae is a most effective piece, and can be thoroughly enjoyed as abstract music. The first Entr'Acte is less satisfactory in the concert-room. The following Andantino is graceful, and its plaintive character and delicate orchestration remind one of Schubert. The final movement is a lively dance-measure; the music is vigorous and characteristic. Dr. Mackenzie has seldom written with more spontaneity. The "Dream of Jubal" was given in the second part of the programme. This work bears testimony not only to the composer's skill, but to his musical feeling. Some of the music accompanying the recitation is delicate and picturesque, and the "Gloria" is clever. But in the funeral march with chorus Dr. Mackenzie strikes home; it is, indeed, an impressive number. Miss Macintyre, Miss Marian Mackenzie, and Messrs. Lloyd and Novara were heard to advantage; and Miss Julia Neilson, though at times somewhat too demonstrative, recited admirably. The chorus sang with great spirit.

On Thursday morning a good rendering of the "Scotch" Symphony was given under Mr. Randegger's direction. This was followed by the same composer's "Hear my prayer," the solo part of which was agreeably sung by Miss Liza Lehmann. Mendelssohn originally wrote the accompaniment for organ, but afterwards scored it for orchestra. The latter was used, though the former is, we think, the more effective. The charm and feeling of this composition ought to be fully acknowledged, but the "superlative" praise given to it in the programme-book is unwise. The over-worshippers of Mendelssohn have already done him sufficient harm.

Sir Arthur Sullivan conducted his "Martyr of Antioch" in the second part of the concert. It is ten years since this work was first heard at Leeds, but the "Golden Legend" produced there six years later has achieved far greater success. In the "Martyr" one can admire the bright rhythmical "Pagan" choruses, the affecting "Funeral Anthem," and the "martyr" music near the close. In these numbers the composer appears at his best. But in the rest of the music there is much that is dull and even trivial. That the "Pagan" should, as we feel in the case, be much stronger than the "Christian" element is most unsatisfactory. And not only is the weakness to be deplored, but the importance given to the sun-worshippers is too marked; the real "sacred drama" shrinks to very small proportions. Miss Macintyre, Miss Damian, Messrs. Lloyd and Marsh made the most of their parts. The chorus sang with energy, and the composer was received with enthusiasm.

The miscellaneous concert in the evening drew a full house, but the programme was unworthy of the occasion. It was a strange and unsatisfactory mixture of good and bad. There were several numbers decidedly below festival mark; but the two comic opera songs sung (and, it must be admitted extremely well) by Mr. Ben Davies were altogether out of place. Miss Macintyre was encored for her brilliant rendering of the Waltz-air from "Roméo." The only other encore of the evening was obtained by Miss Angelica Berzon, whose solo on the harp was another peculiar feature of the programme. Miss Berzon is an excellent performer on this instrument. Mr. Lloyd sang "Lohengrin's Farewell" most effectively. Mr. Henschel gave Wolfram's fantasy from "Tannhäuser" with artistic taste, but this Wagner excerpt is out of place in a concert. Mr. Hamish MacCunn conducted his clever orchestral ballad "The Ship o' the fiend," and Mr. E. German his effective "Richard III." overture; both works, especially the latter which was the better played, were well received.

The performance of "Elijah" on the Friday morning drew a large audience. Mme. Nordica, Miss McKenzie, and Miss Damian, all sang with taste and feeling; and Mr. Ben Davies achieved considerable success in the tenor music. Of course, much depended upon Mr. Alec Marsh as interpreter of the Prophet music. His voice was not all that could be desired in the matter of steadiness, and he was evidently nervous or excited; but his conception of the part was thoroughly good and earnest. It is perhaps fair to state that he was singing the music for the first time. The chorus, a little rough at times, sang with energy; the "Thanks be to God" was a grand success.

The festival concluded on Friday evening with the second act of the "Flying Dutchman," a selection from Bach's "Suite" in D, and various miscellaneous pieces, vocal and instrumental. The Wagner parts were artistically rendered by Mme. Nordica (Senta), Miss McKenzie (Mary), Mr. Ben Davies (Erik), Mr. Novara (Daland), and last, but not least, by Mr. Henschel as the Dutchman.

The great improvement in the choir is the chief feature of the Festival, and this is a hopeful sign for the future. The total number of persons attending this year was 7,470, but three years ago the number was larger by several hundreds.

J. S. SHEDLOCK.

MUSIC NOTES.

THE Popular Concerts recommenced on Monday evening, when Sir Charles and Lady Hallé were received with great cordiality. The performance of Beethoven's great Quartet in F (Op. 59, No. 1), by Mme. Néruda and Messrs. Ries, Straus, and Piatti was magnificent. Sir Charles played "Les Adieux" Sonata with his accustomed finish, and the last movement was given with unusual spirit; the work, the place, the occasion, everything seemed favourable. Brahms's fine pianoforte Trio in C Minor was included in the programme. Mr. Ben Davis received an encore for his singing of Signor Piatti's "Awake, awake!" Mr. Chappell has commenced his season successfully. He could not have had a better programme. The change of hour was welcome to many frequenters, and the choice of a Sonata by the pianist is a good example to be followed by others.

AN Overture by Miss E. M. Smyth was played for the first time at the Crystal Palace last Saturday afternoon; it is intended to be a tone picture of the tragedy of Anthony and Cleopatra. There is one theme representing Love, and another War, while, altogether, a detailed programme is carried out within the prescribed Overture form. The music is clever and the scoring effective. Mr. Leonard Borwick played Saint Sacus's Pianoforte Concerto in G

Minor, with excellent technique and expression, but we should have liked a more sparkling rendering of the second and third movements. He afterwards gave some solos. His reading of Chopin is classical rather than romantic. He received an encore for his Liszt "Etude." Mme. Tavery gave a dramatic rendering of Weber's "Ocean, thou mighty monster."

SEÑOR SARASATE gave his first orchestral concert at St. James's Hall on Saturday afternoon. He has come early in the season; but, judging from the crowded hall and the enthusiastic applause on this occasion, he cannot come too soon or too often. He played two Concertos, one by Leonard, the other by Max Bruch, and for his rendering of the latter was recalled again and again to the platform. Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Beethoven's "King Stephen" Overture were given under Mr. Cusins's direction.

MME. BERTHE MARX, heard hitherto only at the Sarasate Concerts, gave a pianoforte recital on Thursday afternoon at St. James's Hall. She played Schubert's great Fantasia in C. Except in the last movement, her technique was good; but the reading was cold. In some numbers of Schumann's Phantasie Stücke Mme. Marx appeared to still less advantage; she has not caught the spirit of the composer. Probably with her skilful fingers she would be able to do far better justice to music of a lighter kind.

"It embodies the thoughts of an eminent geologist on some of the chief flaws and discrepancies in what he justly styles the 'hypothesis' of evolution. If there is anything calculated to arrest the cocksure young scientist, who is always the young man in a hurry, this book will do it. Perhaps nothing but a counterblast—and Sir Wm. Dawson's book is too well reasoned to deserve the term—can be expected to shake the unflinching confidence of the middleman of science, who purvey Darwinism, or what they consider to be Darwinism, to the intelligent multitude."—Saturday Review.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN &amp; CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

SIR SAMUEL WHITE BAKER.

WILD BEASTS AND THEIR WAYS:

REMINISCENCES OF EUROPE, ASIA, AFRICA, AND AMERICA. From 1845-88.

With Special permission dedicated to H.R.H. the Prince of Wales.

By SIR SAMUEL W. BAKER, M.A., F.R.G.S., F.R.S.,

Author of "The Nile Tributaries of Abyssinia," "The Albert N'yanza, Great Basin of the Nile," &amp;c. With Illustrations. 2 vols., 8vo, 32s.

The TIMES says: "The work is full of exciting adventure." The STANDARD says: "Not only scientists, but all lovers of adventure, will cordially welcome these two volumes." The ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE says: "These two entertaining volumes are noticeably free from a common fault in books of sport; they do not reek with bloodshed. Sir Samuel Baker is a true sportsman, and hates mere slaughter; he is also a practical naturalist, and his book will be read with delight even by those sensitive animal-lovers who detect any form of sport which involves death or pain among animals. Open the book where you will, you will chance upon something which makes you unwilling to close it."

The PALL MALL GAZETTE says: "Will give endless delight to the reader. Sir Samuel's reminiscences of sport in the four quarters of the globe are full of interest from beginning to end."

NEW NOVELS.

BY MRS. OLIPHANT.

KIRSTEEN: the Story of a Scotch Family Seventy Years

Ages. By Mrs. OLIPHANT. 3 vols., crown 8vo, 31s. 6d.

The ATHENÆUM says:—"The true human nature, in its infinite variety, which custom cannot stale, has seldom been more freshly treated by the veteran author. The fierce, wild figure of the laird, Drumcarro, the 'auld slave-driver,' who has earned enough in dark regions of the West Indies to buy back a corner of the hereditary estate, is enough to give the book an air of originality. But it is in the contrasted characters of the three unmarried sisters, and the simple tragedy of Kirsteen's noble love, that the central interest will be found."

BY F. MARION CRAWFORD.

A CIGARETTE-MAKER'S ROMANCE. By F. Marion

CRAWFORD, Author of "Mr. Isaacs," "Dr. Claudius," &amp;c. 2 vols., globe 8vo, 12s.

The SCOTSMAN says:—"It is as good as anything he has ever done. The book is most interesting, and it leaves upon the mind that elevating impression which results only from a high and successful effort in art. It may be heartily recommended to everyone who deserves to read a genuinely romantic love story."

THE METEORITIC HYPOTHESIS of the ORIGIN of COSMICAL SYSTEMS. By J. NORMAN LOCKYER, F.R.S., Correspondent of the Institute of France; Professor of Astronomical Physics in the Normal School of Science, &c. 8vo, 17s. net. [Next week.]

FIVE YEARS WITH THE CONGO CANNIBALS.

By HERBERT WARD.

With 83 Illustrations by the Author, Victor Perard, and W. B. Davis.

"The story of his wanderings is full of adventurous incident, and the book contains much valuable and significant information."—Times.

MY SHIPMATE LOUISE: the Romance of a Wreck. By W. Clark Russell,

Author of "An Ocean Tragedy," &c. 3 vols, crown 8vo.

"Mr. Clark Russell has done nothing to exceed the dramatic strength and sustained interest of this romance . . . In short, this is one of the most powerful novels that have been published for a long time."—Glasgow Herald.

BAIL UP! a Romance of Bushrangers and Blacks. By Hume Nisbet,

Author of "The Land of the Hibiscus Blossom," &c. With Frontispiece and Vignette by the Author. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

BETWEEN LIFE and DEATH. By Frank Barrett, Author of "Fettered for Life," &c. 3 vols, crown 8vo.

"Mr. Barrett has written things that will compare not unfavourably with 'The Woman in White'; and this is the praise that must be bestowed upon his latest work. It is a novel of intensest interest, full of incident, and written in his own terse, crisp, and spirited style . . . Mr. Barrett's picture of his young heroine is positively fascinating in power."—Scotsman.

THE WORD and the WILL. By James Payn, Author of "By Proxy," "The Burnt Millon," &c. 3 vols, crown 8vo.

"Mr. Payn has written few better stories, if any . . . Full of neatly-turned points of pleasant fun . . . It is a delightful novel and deserves to be widely read."

Glasgow Herald.

CUFFINO, &amp;c. By Ouida, Author of "Under Two Flags," &amp;c. Crown 8vo, red cloth extra, 3s. 6d.

"Ouida is seen at her best in her short stories; and though there is nothing in these four tales which quite equals in pathetic impressiveness such triumphs of art as 'A Tale of Two Cities' and 'Two Little Wooden Shoes,' they are very nearly approached by the story of poor Lulu . . . The workmanship is excellent throughout, and the stories have the positive charms of simple grace and pathos."—Manchester Examiner.

A FELLOW of TRINITY. By Alan St. Aubyn and Walter Wheeler. 3 vols,

crown 8vo.

"Certainly the best novel of University life that has appeared for many years."—Spectator.

A WARD of the GOLDEN GATE. By Bret Harte, Author of "A Waif of the Plains," &amp;c. With

"A strong and fresh story, written in Bret Harte's best manner. The story is rich in admirable and delightful men. The minor characters are full of humour. The book as a capital set of illustrations."—Scotsman.

A WEIRD GIFT. By Georges Ohnet, Author of "Dr. Rameau," &amp;c. Translated by Albert D. Vandam.

Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 3s. 6d.

"So interesting in its way that few will begin it without reading it through."—Scotsman.

LIFE, LETTERS, AND DIARIES

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE,*FIRST EARL OF IDDESLEIGH.

By ANDREW LANG.

With Three Portraits and a View of Pynes.

2 vols., post 8vo, 31s. 6d.

The PALL MALL GAZETTE says:—

"With the exception of the memoirs of Lord Beaconsfield and Mr. Gladstone themselves, no more interesting political biography is likely to be published in the present generation. In Mr. Andrew Lang, Sir Stafford Northcote has found in many ways an excellent biographer. We venture to predict, in virtue of the biographer's skill, that wherever it is read it will be voted excellent good reading."

The TIMES says:—

"Of Sir Stafford Northcote, the blameless English gentleman, the scholar, and lover of literature, his pleasure, his diversion, his consolation, Mr. Lang gives a picture which ought to satisfy the most jealous and exacting friend. Among the most valuable parts of these volumes are the long letters written in all the freedom of friendship to Mr. Disraeli on public affairs."

The OBSERVER says:—

"Mr. Lang's long-expected life of Lord Iddesleigh will be read with great interest, not only by political and personal friends of the deceased statesman, but by all who love a good piece of biography. There is a good deal in these volumes which will delight those who like to get an occasional peep behind the scenes. Particularly valuable in this connection are the chapters on Sir Stafford Northcote as a parliamentary leader, and the extracts from the diary which he kept during the years 1880 to 1885. This worthy tribute to his memory will serve as a guide for future generations of statesmen."

The DAILY CHRONICLE says:—

"Mr. Lang has discharged the duties of a biographer with great taste and judgment, and in a manner which harmonises well with his subject. He tells the story of a simple noble life without resorting to disguise or exaggeration, and he makes no attempt to excite artificial interest or admiration in the character which he so faithfully portrays."

The SCOTSMAN says:—

"The life of a country gentleman, a man of affairs, a party leader, by one of the most fascinating writers of the day."

LITERATURE.

Life, Letters, and Diaries of Sir Stafford Northcote, First Earl of Iddesleigh. By Andrew Lang. In 2 vols. (Blackwood.)

THE general good fortune which attended the life of Sir Stafford Northcote has been continued to this biography. Perhaps it would be more correct to say that the qualities which made the great happiness of his domestic life and the success of his public career seem to have guided his biographer in the selection of papers and letters, some of which are deplorably dull.

Mr. Lang's Introduction deserves the warmest appreciation and gratitude from all the friends of Sir Stafford Northcote, as a most skilful, most attractive, most eloquent portrayal of his amiable character. Biography has never presented a frontispiece more pleasing and, it may be added, more truthful. He was "a gentleman innocent of self-seeking"; he was never "animated by the restless eagerness of ambition"; "he lived without a stain and he died without an enemy." He was "plain, manly, simple, untouched by any affectation, unembittered by any unfulfilled aspirations or desires." "In business he was unsurpassed," and "the practical character of his mind was at once his force and limitation." In this long and admirable epitaph Mr. Lang naturally forbears from enlarging upon his extraordinary, his almost unwarranted, success. He had no audacious genius, no great initiative power in politics; yet, by a happy blending of common qualities with a predominance of those that are the best and most esteemed, he held without discredit high and valuable offices in the state, and saw his two elder sons sharing with him such service of the Crown. By steady perseverance, by application of well-trained capacity for business, he outran many of far greater legislative faculties. At the last he was somewhat rudely dealt with, according to the measure of his capacity rather than of his great worth; and it may be that this less than kind treatment of a nature so loyal, so gentle and so sensitive, inflicted a mortal wound. On this, as upon many other points of his career, there is an absence of information so great as to cause a sense of incompleteness. We have letters, and very long and laboured letters, from Sir Stafford Northcote to his leaders; but a complete dearth prevails as to communications from those ruling persons. This is notable throughout both volumes; and it is a loss of much consequence—first because his communications would be read with more pleasure in contrast with the work of political genius, and also because, although Sir

Stafford Northcote was a man of strong opinions, yet as he advanced in life he seemed to grow not less but more amenable to the influences of leadership.

If we must find fault with Mr. Lang's admirable performance, it shall be in that he does not throughout preserve the manner of his Introduction. He has not been able to resist the worse than useless interruption and interjection of sentences and parentheses which are so involved that sometimes we hardly know whether they belong to Sir Stafford or to his biographer. Now and then we have concluded they are Mr. Lang's, because they betray a smart acerbity which was not in the nature of Sir Stafford Northcote. It is a further defect in the biography that these are always aimed against the only man in public life for whom Northcote professed unmeasured respect. Examples of Mr. Lang's besetting fault are only too easily met with. Sir Stafford, speaking on the income-tax, undertook to put some of Mr. Gladstone's words "into plain English," to whom Mr. Gladstone replied:

"My English is my own child [who ever thought his own child 'plain']? and I greatly prefer it to the construction so liberally placed on it by my hon. friend. . . . He mutilates and mangles it so that I cannot recognise it."

Is that poor joke Mr. Lang's? It is one of the cases of possible doubt. But take another: "Lord Palmerston had died and with him old England. New times had begun and the people was to come to its own—and to other people's." In another place, Mr. Lang writes of "years before there was doubt about property, everywhere—the present happy condition of our affairs." Mr. Lang cannot mention Majuba without a parenthesis which is certainly his own. In one place it is "(a feather in the Liberal cap)." And as to Gordon, Mr. Lang is more opposed than were the Opposition. He almost reproves Sir Stafford for the opinion that Gordon's "plans had always seemed to him rather vague and extravagant." But while there are many evidences of this undoubted failing, which fifty or a hundred judicious strokes of the pen would remove with great advantage from the next edition, the excellent work of the biographer is far more conspicuous.

Northcote's youth was like his manhood.

A fellow-oarsman writes:

"I remember once we were run into by a large 'tub' full of cockneys. I am afraid we all used some rather ornate language except N., who, without a word, set himself to stop up a hole in the bows by stuffing part of his coat into it."

That is a very characteristic anecdote; but the prominent feature in this narrative of Northcote's youth has reference to his religious opinions. Considering his tendency to Irvingism, and the long letters he addressed to his father, Mr. Lang is hardly justified as to the whole life in saying, "He took theology as he found it, without questionings of that which is eternally inviting, and eternally refusing to gratify, our curiosity." That was not the temper in which, in his twenty-second year, he thus addressed his father:

"You are already aware that I have been for some time induced to believe that the Lord is now speaking in his Church by the mouths of men. . . . When so great a claim is set up, and when a person is induced to think that it is well grounded, surely it cannot be that person's duty to sit still and not to inquire into the whole matter."

But though he could not agree with his father that it would be his duty to refrain from listening to the alleged inspiration of the Irvingites, he was so well disciplined by nature that, though he could not promise to relinquish his belief, he was willing to forego inquiry and to pledge himself

"that I will on no account take any step, such as leaving the Church of England or joining myself to that now being gathered, without your free consent, unless any unforeseen circumstances should occur, however persuaded I may become of the truth of the work."

Before his marriage, which was in every respect happy and suitable, he gave his father at full length his views upon "the holy ordinance of matrimony."

"My own idea of the rights of a father in such a case is this—first, that under any circumstances he has a right to require that his son shall not marry a person who is otherwise than thoroughly respectable; and, secondly, that when his son derives his maintenance from him, he shall have a voice in the amount of fortune which he will require in the lady—i.e., that when the father makes a sacrifice in order to enable his son to marry he may require that he shall not marry on that alone. . . . What is it that you require? Money? I will endeavour to acquire that in a more laborious way than by marrying an heiress. Rank? I will endeavour to raise my family in a nobler way than marrying a peeress."

Possibly Mr. Gladstone, to whom Northcote became private secretary in 1842, aided in settling his religious doubts, of which no more was heard. A devoted Peelite in 1843, admiring Mr. Gladstone "as the one statesman of the present day in whom I feel entire confidence and with whom I cordially agree," he there found his appropriate place in politics; and if the policy of that band had been sufficient for one of the great parties in the state, a Peelite Sir Stafford would have remained until 1886, when he would probably have passed into a "paper Unionist." He proceeded by easy stages into Conservatism, with one reserve. In 1847, in his first address as a candidate for parliament, he wrote: "A free-trader I have always been since I could form any opinion of my own upon the subject"; and to that declaration he was ever faithful, publicly withholding his confidence from the late Lord Derby until convinced that he "will not attempt to revive protective imposts."

The name of Sir Stafford Northcote first became known from his position as secretary to the Royal Commission for the Exhibition of 1851. Five years afterwards he entered parliament, as member for Dudley, through the influence of Lord Ward, who "is a staunch Peelite, and very anxious that the borough should be represented by a pure animal of that breed; but, if there was to be any admixture, he would rather it were Derbyism than Radicalism." He applied to Gladstone and Sidney Herbert to recommend him a candidate of this complexion, and Gladstone said he thought it would be as nearly as possible mine."

But it happened that, when Lord Palmerston's Government were beaten on the case of the Chinese lorch "Arrow," Lord Ward had previously represented to Sir Stafford Northcote "that he should take it as a great favour if I would leave the house without voting." Sir Stafford took counsel with Mr. Gladstone, voted against Lord Ward's wishes, and felt that his connexion with Dudley must terminate. That incident led him to North Devon at the next dissolution, where he was beaten. Then Disraeli proposed to him a seat at Stamford, and "possibly a secretaryship at the treasury." Sir Stafford seems to have made a good bargain, for he wrote: "I shall certainly not accept the seat without the office." From that moment, though extremely anxious not to mark himself as "Dizzy's man," there can be no doubt that he was so marked by Disraeli, who "talked as if he had always had my interests in the very centre of his heart," whereas, if we may say so, Mr. Disraeli had previously dissembled his love." From henceforth Northcote's allegiance was made over from Gladstone to his Conservative rival. In this, however, there was nothing mercenary, for throughout Sir Stafford had been frankly Conservative; but it does not seem that his full admiration was ever transferred. Northcote knew Disraeli from the first. At the very beginning of their acquaintance Disraeli remarked, "There is no gambling like politics," which struck the blue-eyed Devonshire squire as a "characteristic speech." Years afterwards, when they had become intimate, Northcote was at Kirby Hall in Yorkshire, where he found that "the principal delight of our friends here is Dizzy's advice to the farmers to cross their sheep with the Cotswolds. Can't you imagine him gravely giving it as if he knew the difference between a Cotswold and a Southdown?"

Sir Stafford Northcote possessed that which Disraeli never acquired, a profound acquaintance with the business of the treasury. His first great service to his party in parliament was a speech against the repeal of the paper duty, which Lord Derby, "the Rupert of debate," characterised as "a powerful and brilliant speech," and which Disraeli referred to as "irresistible." Disraeli was in high good humour; and when Mr. Gladstone defeated them by a majority of 18, he said, "as it was in its teens it could hardly be called a majority at all." Sir Stafford Northcote had also immense parliamentary knowledge; and statesmen like the late Lord Derby and Mr. Disraeli, whose furniture of that solid and unshowy sort was slight in comparison, felt all the delight of partisans in his early speeches. But, in truth, Northcote was never brilliant; and his papers, with so little admixture of letters from the very brilliant men with whom he was associated, have needed all the skilful presentation which has been so well given. Mr. Lang's summaries of long and uninteresting parliamentary periods are extremely well done, and the opinions uttered by Sir Stafford through perhaps a whole session are given fairly and clearly in a page or two. This is a great help to the reader, and is no disadvantage to the memory of Sir Stafford Northcote, who was never ill-natured, never rude, never brilliant or bitter, and who held to the wise opinion that

"Funny speeches are not difficult to make, but it is difficult to make them and retain the respect of the hearers."

Some of his best speeches were delivered outside the domain of politics. He loved letters, with great knowledge and reading. From these volumes we should be inclined to suggest as one of his happiest and most characteristic paragraphs the following from his rectorial address at Edinburgh:

"There is in the old learning a charm which carries us away from the bonds and fetters of the workaday world, refreshes us when we are weary, elevates us when our arms are sinking, cheers us when we are despondent, calms us when we are agitated, moderates our minds and thoughts, alike when we are in prosperity and in adversity, sets before us high examples of courage and patience and wisdom and unselfishness, and does us, too, the inestimable service of renewing in our own hearts the memories of our nobler, though probably less practical, selves—such as we were when we began to look eagerly forward to the race in which we had not yet engaged, and which we have since found so absorbing of our energies."

Now that titles are to be subject of debate, it is well to remember that, so long ago as 1865, Northcote thought "Gladstone made a terribly long stride in his downward progress" in a speech in which he then "laid down the doctrine that the title was national property, and ought to be dealt with by the state in the manner most advantageous to the people." "I am bound to Dis," said Northcote in 1866, and so it was. He probably agreed when "Dis. advanced the theory that it was a great advantage to a leader of the house of Commons that he should be, not unable, but unwilling, to speak."

The second volume opens with Northcote's share in the Alabama Commission, upon which he represented the opposition. The story is not too full; but one could dispense with Mr. Lang's gratuitous, and yet not valuable, opinion that "practically, arbitration is a farce." The first great office Northcote held was that of secretary of state for India; but he was far better fitted for the place of chancellor of the exchequer, in which he succeeded Mr. Gladstone in 1874. The dissolution of that year was probably an error on the part of Mr. Gladstone. The surplus he left was a boon to the Tories, and Northcote on the whole dispensed it wisely. He abolished the duty on sugar. Mr. Gladstone "thought that in the last forty years no man had taken the office of chancellor of the exchequer 'with as great a capacity for the discharge of its duties on the whole, from his general intelligence, his experience, knowledge and assiduity combined,' as Sir Stafford."

But his success declined with the years of prosperity, and his hopeful schemes of 1874-75 were brought to nought by the years of trouble and distress in 1878-79. He did not like the purchase of the Suez Canal shares. He was "decidedly against purchasing." But he had to defend the transaction in the House of Commons, which he did with no great emphasis. He was responsible for the finance of two wars—that in Abyssinia and that in Zululand, the expenses of which were monstrous and miscalculated. Then followed the war between Turkey and Russia. Our ambassador at Constantinople sent a telegram saying that the question of the Dardanelles was to be arranged between the Congress and the Czar. But the government had ordered the British squadron to enter the Strait on the assumption that the matter was to be arranged by the Sultan and the Czar, to whom they were not willing to leave it. In these circumstances,

"Smith despatched an Admiralty telegram at once. It was not in time to stop the fleet, but it brought it back again to the entrance of the Strait. Looking back, I think this was the greatest mistake we made in the whole business; but at the moment we were all agreed on it. The next day came a correction of the telegram; it was not between the Emperor and the Congress the question of the Strait was to be settled, but between the Emperor and the Sultan! How we gnashed our teeth."

Their fall soon came in the dissolution of 1880; and when "all hope was ended" for the Tory party, Northcote wrote to Disraeli: "I suppose we made a mistake in dissolving," which has probably been the judgment of many a minister in like circumstances. Perhaps the most responsible connexion of Sir Stafford Northcote with the Reform Acts of 1884-85 was in a private, if not clandestine, meeting he had with Mr. Gladstone at Sir A. West's house in St. James's Palace, whither Northcote went at eleven o'clock at night, "and was let in by Mr. West." He found "Gladstone alone, and remained with him about half-an-hour." That was the beginning of the conferences by which the Redistribution Bill was passed without disagreement.

The final period of Northcote's life began with Mr. Gladstone's resignation in 1885. He was too gentle to press any claim to be prime minister against the ascendancy of Lord Salisbury. He soon learnt the wish of the Carlton Club that he should go to the Upper House. He went there, not liking his position as first lord of the treasury, subordinate to the prime minister, who was also foreign secretary. Lord Salisbury and Lord Randolph Churchill were dominant in the Cabinet of 1885. In 1886, on the formation of Lord Salisbury's new administration, he was gratified with the appointment of foreign minister, which he held for about five months, until, upon Lord Randolph Churchill's resignation, and Mr. Goschen's accession, Lord Salisbury quite needlessly, unless he thought that he could do the work better himself, took over the foreign office from Lord Iddesleigh at the beginning of 1887. To facilitate negotiations with Lord Hartington and others, Lord Iddesleigh had placed his seat in the cabinet at his chief's disposal; and he disliked the result on public and private grounds, believing that the two responsibilities of prime minister and foreign secretary should not be upon one man's shoulders. The offer of the place and precedence of the president of the council did not attract him, yet probably impartial opinion would side with Lord Salisbury in thinking Lord Iddesleigh better fitted for that position than to hold the seals of the foreign office. His death in its scene and in its suddenness was shocking. His memory was honoured by his contemporaries in parliament, and is cherished by all his countrymen.

ARTHUR ARNOLD.

The Isles of Greece: Sappho and Alcaeus.
By Frederick Tennyson. (Macmillan.)

THE personality of Sappho has been the dream of poets, as her outward semblance has been of artists: the fiery fragments that remain to us of the vanished luminary reveal so little to the eye, and so much to the imagination, that one cannot wonder that attempts are made to fill up the outline and "launch once more that lustre," as Mr. Browning says. Michael Field has been tempted into the splendid audacity of trying to work the fragments into lyrics: the fifty-first poem in Long Ago, developing Sappho's words, ἔσσα γειαιτέρα, reaches perhaps the highest point attainable in that way. And now Mr. Frederick Tennyson shows us what can be done by another method—the method of weaving the few ascertainable facts about Sappho into a web of imaginary biography in verse. Sappho tells her own story here, and Alcaeus his; and the poet throws in a sketch of Pittacus and Myrsilus, and makes Stesichorus himself recite his tale of Calyce; in the episode called "Chios" (pp. 387-416) Homer's self is introduced; the last poem "Euthanasia" depicts the almost simultaneous deaths of Sappho and Alcaeus, united in the friendship of old age, with the old loves and resentments cast behind them. All this needs a great deal of constructive imagination. The fluency and freshness of Mr. Tennyson never fail him: his heroines and heroes live, to him, in a land of eternal summer, amid immortal memories, and with a dim hope clinging to them that death may not be the end that it appears.

The "intersection" of several stories in this book, and the amazing fertility of the poet's vocabulary, combine to make the poem somewhat unmanageably long. It contains, I compute, between twelve and thirteen thousand lines; and there is not really poetic material in it, corresponding to this bulk. There is no growth, no concentration of interest in it: "link'd sweetness long drawn out" defines it exactly. The sweetness saves it from being dull; but, in spite of Mr. Swinburne's assurance, I cannot quite believe that "A month or twain to live on honey-comb Is pleasant."

Furthermore, the personality of Sappho as here depicted seems to me to be just such a shock to all previous notions of her as would be received by a person who, looking for a draught of fiery wine, quaffed by mistake a sort of drench of pure but tepid water. The perverted passions and sexless frenzy of Lesbos have been, rightly or wrongly, presented to us in English; whatever could be done in that way has been done, and with genius. No one will blame Mr. Tennyson for taking a more reticent line, and showing us a Sappho clothed and in her right mind. But all tradition, all poetic probability, is violated by making the one poetess who spoke the language of passion with fierce and absolute simplicity use the language of sermons on these subjects. Mr. Tennyson's Sappho—delicately and pathetically as she is drawn—most undeniably prosés. Think, for instance, of the highly characteristic incident related by Herodotus (2, 135) concerning Sappho, when her brother Charaxus ransomed Rhodopis the courtesan in Egypt: Χάραξος δὲ ὡς λυσάμενος Ῥοδῶπιν ἀπενόστησε ἐς Μυτιλήνην. ἐν μέλει Σαπφῶ πολλὰ κατεκερτόμησέ μιν—and then hear Mr. Tennyson's Sappho (p. 133):

"'Twas at Naucratis
I met again my brother whom I loved.
For I remembered all our childish days;
And spake such words in secret to him as,
If he forgave not, he cannot forget;
Although he loved not honour; tho' the hours
Dropt thro' the glass too slowly for his thirst
Of passionate delights; tho' for a while
I knew he would not heed me. Yet my hope
Was strong within me that our mother's love
Had sown good seed in a rebellious heart;
My father's voice still echoed in his ears," &c.

We do not know the ode in which Sappho "very much giped" Charaxus about Rhodopis; but the improbability of its having been a solemn admonition—"an improving of the occasion, my brother"—is very great. I would not dwell upon this defect did it not seem to pervade the whole poem in more or less degree. The character of Sappho has been washed out; she has much of eloquence and pathos, but of passion and scorn almost nothing; even her love for Phaon is viewed as a sort of brain-fever. Alcaeus, on the other hand, stands out as an intelligible, though rather verbose, possibility; Pittacus, though only a secondary character, is remarkably well drawn; his overthrow of Myrsilus—by means of a dramatic trick that recalls "Measure for Measure," and would certainly have given a fine opportunity to an Elizabethan dramatist—is one of the best things in the book.

It is not, however, in sketching character, but in expressing emotion, that Mr. Tennyson reaches his highest level. Here (p. 204), in the converse between Alcaeus and Antimenidas, is one of his finest efforts:

"Ah me! how dreadful is the spectre fair
That once was joy in life; how mournful-sweet
The memory of those moments—days—e'en years—
When all before us, whether earth or heaven,
Desert or vineyard, icy peak or plain,
Swathed in the self-same summer azure, fled
Before us as we trod the dews at morn.
Soon shall we stand upon the top of all;
Touch with faint hands the barrenness that seem'd Elysium; hear the silence round us, whence Far songs seem'd waving to us; or only hear
The cinders crash beneath our heels; the dust
Of vanities—cold ashes, loves or fears—
The spirits of the Dead go by as wind,
Or Death, like the lone thunder, calls to us."

Those last two lines are worthy of Mr. Tennyson's name, or of higher praise still, if there be any higher that is also attainable. Again (pp. 104-5), Stesichorus's description of Calyce is full of soft grace.

"Those who heard her to a song-bird sing,
And wait sweet answers, and then sing again;
Or leading on some fond child's lisping tongue
To perfect speech, or uttering to herself
Her love and awe; heard the melodious voice
Of a rare soul. She, like a wood-nymph pure,
Loved the green gloom of sylvan arches, cool
And still, save when great winds or thunders lone

Rolled o'er them their deep music, or sweet breath
Of summer, in the moonlight or at dawn, Sighed thro' the topmost leaves; when the first flower

Look'd on her from the wood-walks; the first note
Of lark at morn, or starry nightingale,
Witched her quick ear; or after many days
Of stormy wind and cloud, the faithful sun
Hailed her at early morn; and as she stept
To meet him thro' the dews, she veiled her eyes
With one small hand, the other filled with spring."

This does not reach the highest level of verse, no doubt: it is too loquacious, too meandering. Nevertheless, it is beautiful, in its own way; and what is most remarkable is, that this book contains literally thousands of lines of this quality, poured out with apparently inexhaustible facility. Perhaps the best thing in the volume is the quiet death of Sappho, with her own song Ἔσπερε, πάντα φέρεῖς on her lips (pp. 440-1): indeed, the whole of the last poem, "Euthanasia," is extremely fine.

The blank verse has for the most part a slightly monotonous beauty, but there are one or two flaws in it that recur teasingly. One is the incidental and apparently unconscious rhymes, e.g. (p. 391):

"The Ægean isles, and the Ægyptian seas,
And pluckt gold fruit from the Hesperides."

and again (p. 156):

"And left me heir to all, which were as nought, Were not my sorrow tempered with this thought."

and (p. 227):

"It is one thing to see the lovely face
Look up to thee a moment after tears;
Another to look on it after years."

and (p. 269)

"And from his high place on the cloth of gold Prone as a blinded Polypheme he rolled."

Another is the occurrence of wholly unmetrical lines, contrasting strangely with the usually musical cadence—e.g. (p. 308):

"Upturn'd eyes look'd on me from a vale."

(p. 85):

"And peep'd thro' fall'n leaves like first youth again."

(p. 140):

"Is not altogether for my sake."

(p. 354):

"Phantasy, that like to fiery wine," and, strangely of all (p. 372):

"Nabuchodonosor o'er the world."

The recurrence of the epithet "viny" is tiresome; "omnisonous" is unfamiliar and ugly. "Bail out" for "bale out" (p. 130) is unfortunate. But these are small matters. Looking at the book as a whole, I would venture to call it a work of beauty ill put together; and its leading character, not the Sappho of history and of the fragments, yet a very stately vision of the dawn of genius and of its old age.

E. D. A. MORSHEAD.

The Stuart Dynasty: Short Studies of its Rise, Course, and Early Exile. By Percy M. Thornton. (Ridgway.)

THE main interest of this work consists in the letters relating to the rebellion of 1715, which are now published for the first time with Her Majesty's permission. They are selected from the Stuart Papers, which were sent by the Cardinal of York to George III., and are now preserved in the library of Windsor Castle.

The principal authors of the correspondence now published by Mr. Thornton are the Chevalier de Saint George (the son of James II.), the Duke of Berwick (his illegitimate half-brother), and Lord Bolingbroke. The letters exchanged between these persons throw light upon the causes which operated in rendering the movement of 1715 abortive. The death of Louis XIV., happening in the midst of the Jacobite preparations for a descent upon Great Britain, was a most serious blow to the Chevalier de Saint George. Writing to the Duke of Berwick a few months before that monarch's decease, "You know," he says, "how much depends upon his life, what I owe him, and what I expect from him." The policy of Louis XIV. was reversed by his nephew, the Regent, who had entered into engagements with the House of Hanover and the Whigs, and who stopped the armament that was being prepared by the Jacobites at Havre. The Chevalier was also deprived of the military services of the Duke of Berwick, whose high rank in the French army precluded him from joining the expedition without the Regent's leave, which was refused. The Prince felt this disappointment keenly, and gave way to his feelings in a manner which shows how the vexations of exile warp a prince's judgment, and unfit him for the conduct of affairs. In a letter to Lord Bolingbroke, he says :

"The Duke of Berwick is now a cypher, and can do no more harm; and if he withdraw his duty from me, I may well my confidence from him. I must confess I cannot but suspect that he hath been sooner or later the cause of the strange diffidence they have of me at the French court, where he never did me good, and where I would never put it in his power to do me harm."

The Duke of Berwick ably defended his conduct in a letter to the Earl of Mar, and his correspondence with the Chevalier shows him to have been a trusty friend and a clear-sighted counsellor of that unfortunate prince. It was the Chevalier's misfortune that he did not know the value of his friends; he quarrelled with Berwick and with Bolingbroke, who had excited the jealousy of the petty coteries of Saint Germain. Bolingbroke, however, to use a phrase of the Duke of Berwick's, had "left no stone unturned" in the Pretender's service. He gave him sound advice throughout, and exerted himself very actively at the French court in securing the benevolent neutrality of the Regent.

The impression left by this correspondence is that the Chevalier was not in earnest about the recovery of his father's crown. His correspondents are continually urging him to greater activity. The Duke of Berwick and Lord Bolingbroke press him to strengthen his cause by a matrimonial alliance with a princess of the house of Austria; he answers carelessly :

"Since Bolingbroke is so much for my marriage, why might it not be proposed to him to go to Blois to stay there, a fine, pleasant country, and where he may have an occasion of seeing pretty Miss, and of even negotiating that affair if t'other fails, as I believe it will after what I acquainted the Queen with some days ago."

He seems to have been amiable and good-natured, fond of ease and jovial company, if one may judge from a letter which he wrote on his return to France from his ill-fated Scottish expedition. Writing from Boulogne to a Mr. Russell, he says :—

"I had been in pain for you, had you not let me hear from you; we have found ourselves very solitary without you, and miss you, but I hope our absence won't be long, though I believe I shall scarce reach St. Germain's before Monday. I lie to-morrow at Abbeville, and if you can reach it before nine, I'll stay supper for you. . . . Roger and I have been drinking your health in Burgundy."

Mr. Thornton's inference from this letter, that the Chevalier de Saint George landed at Boulogne, and not (as historians allege) at Gravelines, does not seem to be supported by dates. From a letter of the Earl of Mar, it appears that the French coast was reached by the fugitives on February 10. The Chevalier's letter from Boulogne bears the date of February 23; and the interval between February 10 and 23 may be accounted for partly by the Prince's uncertain movements, and partly by the time spent on the road between Gravelines and Boulogne.

Mr. Thornton promises "on a future occasion to publish, with Her Majesty's approval, such of the Stuart Papers at Windsor as bear on the events of 1745, when Prince Charles Stuart strove to recover his grandfather's throne." It is to be hoped that he may soon be able to fulfil his promise.

WILLIAM MARKHEIM.

North-Eastern France; South-Eastern France; South-Western France. By Augustus J. C. Hare. (George Allen.)

THESE three volumes are to be followed by a fourth, North-Western France; together they will form a complete guide for the whole of France. Tourists are now so numerous that it seems to be worth while to write guide-books that address a special class. The present volumes are examples of this. In the first place they are abundantly illustrated. Each volume has about five hundred tiny woodcuts inserted in the text. These, by reason of their small scale, often fail in rendering landscape; but they frequently give just the amount of architectural detail necessary to recall with accuracy the buildings represented. Another distinguishing trait is the numerous quotations from the best French and English authors descriptive of the scenes visited. In architecture, Viollet le Duc, Ferguson, and Petit are the writers most frequently cited; in history, Henri Martin, Michelet, Froissart; while Merimée, Taine, George Sand, Lamartine, Hamerton, and many others aid in the descriptions of towns, of manners, and of scenery. Great attention is also given to historical and ecclesiastical events; and such places as Paray-le-Monial, Ars, Rocamadour, &c., have almost a disproportionate space given to them.

In fact, it is in the different proportion of treatment given to certain places and districts that these volumes depart most widely from the ordinary guide-books. It is not on the best but rather on the least known objects that our author expends his greatest strength. This work will certainly not supersede the usual guide-books for the mountaineer, either in Dauphiné, the Auvergne, or the Pyrenees. It will not be a favourite with scientific men, whether their hobby be geology, or botany, or natural history, or economics. The average tourist, or sojourner, will miss the usual lists of bankers, consuls, English medical men, and Church services in the most popular resorts; but it will be the preferred of all possessed with architectural and ecclesiastical tastes. The numerous castles and chateaux, the cathedrals, churches, shrines, and older buildings, often isolated or situated in the towns and villages of central, and what we may term unknown, France, have never been so well described and illustrated within so small a compass. We have only one remark to make on this. Like many others, Mr. Hare does not recognise the distinction between Romane and Romanesque, especially in the Auvergne, and in all France south of it; and consequently he often assigns too late a date to the earlier portions of buildings in the former style. Romane we take to be an independent native development of the Gallo-Roman architecture, and to be chronologically continuous with it; Romanesque is a more foreign derivation from the Byzantine, and does not appear in France till later. Both are originally of Roman origin, hence their likeness.

The preface and introduction to North-Eastern France contain most useful remarks. Perhaps a little too much stress is laid on the discomfort of travel; but the hints are often valuable—none more so than the advice to leave the bulk of one's luggage at the station when passing the night only in a locality and leaving by the same railway next day. The caution not to depend on waiters for information is much needed, for many English err in this respect. In all season-resorts many of the waiters, coachmen, &c., are imported ad hoc, are often foreigners, and neither know nor care anything at all about the country, and simply frame their answers on the question asked. Many an instance of absurd misdirection have we known thus obtained. Mr. Hare rightly remarks that the "commis voyageurs," the commercial travellers with whom one is necessarily thrown, and who are the real persons of consideration in the country inns, "are not always the pleasantest companions in the world." On the other hand, there is no one, especially if he drive his own vehicle, who can give such trustworthy information about roads, inns, the best ways of getting to out-of-the-way places, and the characteristics of the population, as an old "commis voyageur"; and he is generally ready to impart his information, when once he is sure that you are no rival in his trade. On the whole, while we fully allow their numerous good qualities, we think that Mr. Hare paints the French a little too much "couleur de rose." There is a real difference in honesty and in politeness in different districts. In some it is distinctly necessary to arrive at a fixed agreement for prices beforehand; in others there is little fear of an overcharge. The great convenience of having a passport, though legally not necessary, is rightly insisted on; and we would add, if neatly mounted or bound it only adds to its merits.

In a work of this class, where so much space is devoted to local history, architecture, and archaeology, we rather wonder that Mr. Hare says nothing of the excellent Sociétés des Sciences et des Arts, the Sociétés Savantes, which are to be found in almost every considerable town in France, and even in some of the smaller ones. The annual meeting in Paris of these societies is getting yearly more important, far more so than those of the wandering Congrès Archéologique, or Scientifique, of France. In these societies men worth knowing are sure to be met with. Any Englishman belonging to any such society at home, calling on the president or secretary of any of these French local societies, would be sure of a courteous welcome, and of full information, and would most probably receive an invitation to the next meeting or excursion, the expense of which will be very slight in comparison with the advantages gained. A great deal about these societies could be learned by a visit to the Trocadéro, when passing through Paris, from the courteous officials there.

To conclude, as Mr. Hare asks for corrections, we will mention a few needed in the last volume. Surely it is too strong to say, "There is no beauty, and there is no real interest at Arcachon." On the contrary, the Landes have a peculiar beauty at certain seasons, and the spell is more deeply felt because it is unexpected. Often have we heard this surprise expressed. The mention of Wellington's bridge over the Adour hardly suggests that it was a bridge of boats for a temporary purpose only; and to say that the battle of Toulouse "was easily gained by the allies," when the loss of the victors exceeded that of the defeated, is very odd. We are surprised that there is no mention of the Roman mosaics at Lescar. Bidart is not the name of a small bathing place, but Guéthary. Formerly, the station between them was called Bidart-Guéthary; now there is a station at both, but Guéthary is the bathing-place, with hotels, lodging-houses, and English iron-church, not Bidart. As additions are also asked for, we would direct Mr. Hare's attention to M. Martel's Les Cevennes (see the ACADEMY, No. 929), and especially to his further explorations during the past summer. Subterranean boating in the Cevennes may soon become an attraction for adventurous tourists.

WENTWORTH WEBSTER.

Ting-a-Ling Tales. By Frank R. Stockton. (Ward and Downey.)

THESE stories remind us now and then of a real fairy tale; they at least show some signs that the author of Rudder Grange, if he had lived a hundred years or so ago, might have written one. But, of course, he is really a scoffer who only pretends to believe "for fun"; and his dedication of the book "to the memory of all Good Giants, Dwarfs, and Fairies" is nothing but facetious hypocrisy. The mere title is enough to prove his infidelity. "Ting-a-Ling Tales," indeed! As if any real fairy ever bore such a babyish name as Ting-a-Ling. The weakest elf would despise it—out of China, and anybody knows that it is very doubtful whether there were ever any "little people" in that country. But even if we could, for the sake of argument, allow that there might have been a fairy called "Ting-a-Ling," the expression "Ting-a-Ling Tales" is grossly familiar, as anyone but a rank miscreant would have felt at once. Even an Agnostic would have written "Tales of the Fairy Ting-a-Ling."

Of course, Mr. Stockton having little knowledge and less faith has to rely mainly upon his invention and humour to make his story attractive; and as in this sceptical age great store is set by these qualities, his book is well calculated to please. It would be unfair to deny that he has an unusual supply of them, and has also a very keen and poetical insight into nature, as when he says that "the crocuses were coaxing the jonquils almost off their very stems with their pretty ways," an incident which we must all have witnessed, but which, so far as we are aware, has never before been put into words. But even such happy thoughts as these may come to a sceptic, and our appreciation of them must not deter us from our painful duty of stigmatising the author as an impostor. It is a hard word; but, still, what less offensive can be said of a man who narrates in apparent good faith that a fairy was drowned and drowned, "all soaked into the grass," is his daring expression, by the bursting of a human tear? Now, it is usually held that fairies are immortal (at all events good ones), and though so high an authority as William Blake averred that he had seen a fairy's funeral, we all know that Blake was "a little, ahem! you know," and perhaps on this occasion he may have been dreaming. But, at all events, there was a funeral; "by fairy maids," his or her "knell was rung." And the cause of the catastrophe, too—the bursting of a globule of water, probably no larger than a dewdrop—shades of Perrault and D'Aulnoy!

Ignorance, if not worse, meets us at every step where fairies are concerned. Who ever heard, for instance, of a fairy "livery stable," with stalls of butterflies on one side and of grasshoppers on the other. Does Mr. Stockton suppose that Ariel "hired" his bat? We should not wonder if he did; anything is possible for one who asserts that fairies of a "respectable class" (what an expression!) could not "fly or flout in the air, or anything of that sort." And yet it is astonishing how often a writer like this, with no guide but his private fancy, stumbles upon the truth, or very near it. For instance, the story of Nercalina, whose head, after being severed from her body, was, by the malice of a dwarf, joined on again wrong side foremost. Such a thing has indeed happened more than once, and we might have given the writer credit for some real knowledge if he had only known the proper, the only way, in fact, in which the mistake could be rectified. This secret we are not going to divulge; but the notion that her head could be really "turned" by the kiss of a prince is a foolish fable, based, we believe, upon a foolish jest.

As to the giant Tur-il-i-ra, though the name of course is not true gigantesque, he succeeds better. The way the giant searches the tower, by sweeping off story after story, till he comes upon the objects of his pursuit sticking in a huge cheese in the underground vat, is very probable, to say the least of it; and the size and description of his meals are so orthodox that we fancy he must have received some assistance from a pervert, whose name we think we know. But he breaks down, of course, at the end, when he makes the giant go to bed sick and take "a barrel of hot chamomile tea." If this is not anthropomorphism, what is?

Again, we are almost deceived into belief when we come to the sorceress Mahbracca. She is doubtless a historical character; and the whole account of her country—with the Afrites and the ghouls and the herds of the prong-horned Yahuks "grazing on the exuberant and oily foilage"—is so accurate that we almost fancy he must have had it described to him by some one who has been there. The little black demon whom the sorceress kept in pickle, and who afterwards revenged himself by turning her into all sorts of beasts with her own wand, is also credible enough, though we never heard of him. It is only occasionally, as when he speaks of those "dreadful green lizards which poison the air of the deep valleys of Sumatra" (of course it is not Sumatra), that we detect a spurious touch.

In short, we advise all those whose faith in fairies is weak not to read this book. It is exceedingly amusing, it is very funny; many will be inclined to think that there are strokes of genius in it, and that the story of "The Magical Music" is of considerable beauty and shows imagination of no common order; some may even be led to regard Ting-a-Ling himself as a charming little personage, but we warn them that however clever and delightful these tales may be—they are not true.

MR. JAMES PAYN tells a story with the ease and confidence inspired by many successes. If his materials are abundant, he does not waste them like an amateur; if they are meagre, he shows his practised skill by making a little go a long way. This he does in The Word and The Will. The plot is distinctly thin; the characters are few; the incidents, with two exceptions, are not striking; but the result is as pleasant and satisfactory as any reader could wish. Natchett-on-Sea, where Mr. Joseph Adderly lived at the hall and his two nieces at the cottage, could not have been a very desirable place. Indeed, Mr. Payn says it was not. But there are people who find or who make their own little patches of heaven wherever their lot is cast, and Mary Vance at the cottage and Hetty Waldron at the crag were two such people. Between them, with just a little help from Hetty's brother, and Doctor Gray (a dear old practitioner of a type almost gone out), and the vicar, who was a very fine fellow, and a few other sympathetic souls, they made the brightness of Natchett. Mr. Joseph Adderly, who was a miser, was a cloud upon that brightness. It is true that had it not been for him, and had he not been the miserable creature he was, the gossips of the place would have had nothing to talk about. But it is even more to the point that if Mr. Joseph Adderly had been a reasonable being this story would not have been written, and the reader (especially the "gentle" reader) will cheerfully put up with the miser for the sake of Mary and Hetty. The sisters, however, were Mary and Martha. Their mother had been Adderly's sister; but he treated her badly because she did not marry money, and when her two girls were left orphans he allowed them a poor pittance to live upon, and made them understand that they had nothing more to expect from him. Mary was patient and tender under these circumstances, while Martha was resentful. To Mary, besides, came young Waldron as a wooer. Martha had only Mary to love; and though her devotion for her was strong, it was no match for the selfishness which was her chief quality. The fate which overtakes Joseph Adderly, and makes his money an important element in the story, is exceedingly well managed. By a few touches Mr. Payn recalls an episode in Adderly's life which left a victim thirsting for vengeance, and some more graphic sentences make the vengeance complete. The rest of the story is in part an amplified paraphrase, in part a contradiction, of the adage that money is the root of all evil. It is evil when it meets evil, and good when it goes with good. Hetty Waldron, the little invalid who manages everybody, is one of Mr. Payn's best characters. He is evidently fond of her himself, for he puts into her mouth some of the smartest talk in the book. A good deal of this, however, he reserves for his own "asides," which are always welcome. There are stock "properties" of the novel-writer which Mr. Payn does not meddle with. He gives us no glowing sunsets like Mr. Blackmore, no bits of rustic description like Mr. Blackmore, no wonders and weirdnesses like men of a modern school; but he has a store of worldly wisdom, of fine, rich, common sense, and upon this he draws freely, to his readers' delight. There is much of it in this pleasant tale.

Grace of style, freshness of plot, actuality of place, people, and incidents — these rare merits all belong to Bonnie Dundee. It is a story of more or less common occurrences in common life, but the author has invested them with a charm which is essentially that of romance. The heroine is a mill-girl in the Scotch town of Arbroath; the hero is a doctor in the same place; the subordinate characters are other mill-girls and some of the doctor's friends. These do not seem to be very romantic materials; but if the mill-girl has a face which impresses you in the street, and a mind which accords with her face, and a force of character worthy of both, the dullest person can see how easily a story may grow out of her life. Alison Dean was such a girl. John Murdoch's fate was sealed from the moment when the vision of her beauty, radiant under a tartan shawl, stirred in him some old memories he could only vaguely recall. It was long before he realised the blessedness of that fate, and a great many things happened in the meantime—some of them tragic and sad, others bonnie and bright—which the reader must find out for himself. But the interest of the story is rather in the characters than in the events, and it is quite as it should be when the heroine monopolises most of the attention. Alison is all that a noble girl can be. She is brave, as being the daughter of a brave seaman; books, friends, and her own high instincts help to make her the splendid woman she becomes. Murdoch is a shrewd, honest-minded, country practitioner, not in the least idealized, but he fascinates the reader next after Alison; and this again is quite as it should be. The other characters, however, are all strongly individual. Little Mrs. Lindsay, the wife of Murdoch's partner, is a gem of a woman. May Lindsay, her daughter and a marked deterioration from herself, forms a striking contrast, in her young-lady-ishness, to the fine strength of Alison. The namby-pamby poet whom she marries develops a manly vein when she takes to hysterics. But there is not a more real personage in the book, nor one over whose sayings the reader will linger with more enjoyment, than Marget, Mrs. Urquhart's ancient maid. Marget is great in the Scriptures, and seldom says anything without enforcing it by some apposite allusion to the Prophets; but she gets a little mixed sometimes, as when she says: "Lassie, lassie, we're bidden no tae pit oor trust in princes, neither i' the son o' mon. An' though I'm no sayin' the doctor laddie isna weel enuch, I'd hae you remember the inspirit writer wha says, 'A mon's a mon for a' that!'"

A Modern Milkmaid is one of those well-intentioned books in which the aim is good but the execution a little weak. The story opens with a bit of rustic description which only wants a few masterly touches to make the picture pleasing. The same deficiency is apparent throughout the novel. There is almost a wealth of material, but the arrangement of it, and the working in of the prominent lights and shadows, required a more practised or a more facile hand. Even as it is, however, the result is not at all one to be despised. In the rapid development of plot, which converts a milkmaid into a celebrated and accomplished singer, we have something more than the average novel is equal to. It is so rapid a development that Esther Jones, the poor little girl whose first duties in life consisted of housework at her grandmother's farm, passes without breathing time from these associations to others which open to her the great world beyond her village, and the great world of thought also. Some of the situations are original and powerful. Esther's endurance and her silent resolves, in the remarkable scene when Lady Blanche flies to Lecky for protection; Lecky's self-control and calmness in the novel circumstances; Lady Blanche's stolid despair—these and some other passages are really forcible. It seems hardly fair that Esther's physical weakness should have put her in the power of the villain she had so long and so bravely resisted. Lecky is a good, honest fellow, with a touch of clumsiness meant to be characteristic of genius. But about most of the men, and their talk as it relates to women, there is a low tone which detracts from the merit of the novel.

The writers of Come Forth claim, in a prefatory note, that the book is a "reverent attempt" to employ Biblical narrative as material for fiction. This it may be as regards the motive of the work, but it is nevertheless a daring travesty of one of the most spiritual stories in the New Testament. It would probably never have occurred to any serious English writer, or, indeed, to any other American writers than Mr. and Mrs. Ward, to detach the beautiful account of Lazarus and his sisters, and their relations with Jesus, from its place in the Gospels, and to reconstruct it as a romance with luxurious modern accessories, including amorous love-making; the pettiest incidents of every-day life also having their place in it. That is what Mr. and Mrs. Ward have done. Lazarus in their hands becomes a prosperous Pharisee—a building contractor!—who employs masons and carpenters, and undertakes large trading affairs. Martha is a quarrelsome widow, whom it cannot have been pleasant to live with. In the course of his business Lazarus engages to do some repairs at the palace of Annas the High Priest—taking care, like a shrewd tradesman, to insist on a good price—and while he is superintending this work he falls in love with the High Priest's daughter. This young lady is an eastern beauty of what one may suppose to be a transatlantic type. She is an imperious princess, and a giddy minx at the same time. Her fascinations have so much power with the sober master-builder that he arranges clandestine meetings with her, and stops out late at night, to the great concern of his sisters. What is worse, her influence over him is so strong that she almost persuades him to forswear the Nazarene. The supernaturalism in the story is of a tricky pantomimic kind, though exception should perhaps be made of the healing of Ariella, and the restoration of sight to Baruch. The episode of the loves of this afflicted couple has some beauty in it, and a naturalness not to be found elsewhere. Defects of style are relatively a small matter; but they aggravate the other in-congruities of the book. It is something new to learn that "Martha's tongue on the whole was off-set by her cooking"; that Lazarus was "the progressive, the protestant, the come-outer of his faith and times"; and that in the Judaic evening "the scorching colours of the air died away without a struggle." But such a passage as the following is surely unmatched for boldness of illustration: "Walking in the garden in the cool of the day, like the Almighty after creation, an old man viewed his country seat with elderly and opulent satisfaction."

An original plot and good writing make Vice Valentine a very readable story. The altogether strange, false, and difficult part which Valentine Kremleck was made to play by her step-mother is one which no other woman could have performed without suffering from the lie. Her gipsy nature gave her the force, fire, and independence with which she held herself untainted by the fraud in which she was an unwilling instrument. But even she did not escape without searchings of heart and self-accusations, which had much to do with the making of her fine character. Osmund Wynter, the victim of the fraud, had also searchings of heart, for his sensitive and gentle nature made it seem to him that the wrong had chiefly been on his side. An excellent moral lesson—fatal to the theory that the end justifies the means—is deduced from all the entanglements of the story; besides which, most of the people are worth knowing. Valentine herself, with her rich brown complexion and the bright eyes of her race, and especially with her inheritance of the best qualities of that race, is every inch a true woman.

Miss Albert tells a very thrilling story in Behind the Kafes. Her heroines are two sisters, who are so unhappy that one of them resolves to kill herself, but she is unwilling to die without her sister, who does not yield a ready consent. The catastrophe of suicide is prevented by a gentleman who has involuntarily heard the conversation between the sisters; but the girls afterwards become involved in an almost hopeless tangle of difficulties. It would be unfair to say what the difficulties are, or how they manage to emerge from them. The story is one of those clever pieces of weaving and unravelling which are so often met with in "Arrowsmith's Bristol Library."

The prettily bound and pleasantly illustrated stories in Shreds and Patches will delight the children they are written for. They are bright, simple, and natural relations of every-day occurrences. The talk is the talk of children, and the life is child-life—which cannot often be said of these things in children's books.

GEORGE COTTERELL.

SOME PHILOSOPHICAL BOOKS.

"THE LIBRARY OF PHILOSOPHY."—A History of Philosophy. By Johann Eduard Erdmann, Professor of Philosophy in the University of Halle; English translation, edited by W. G. Hough. In 3 volumes. (Sonnenschein.) The "Library of Philosophy" has made an excellent beginning with these three handsome volumes. The original has long been known to students—though not, perhaps, so well as it deserves—as much the fullest and most serviceable general history of philosophy, especially of the Scholastic period and the Renaissance. With the former it deals in more specific detail and with more references than Hauréau, while on the latter its information would probably be difficult to obtain as readily elsewhere. The third volume, also—the sketch of German philosophy since Hegel's death—is fuller than the only works on the subject known to the present writer (those of Zeller, Bluntschli, and Ribot). Erdmann was a Hegelian, but no bias appears in his history, and this work, though coming down only to 1876—a date which precludes any notice of (e.g.) Lazarus, Steinthal, or Wundt—will give English readers a good deal of information hardly attainable elsewhere, especially as to Lotze and Fechner. What those readers probably most need to know is the relation of the Hegelians to Socialism, and the genesis of current German scientific psychology. These matters are somewhat beyond the scope of the present work, but will be provided, it is to be hoped, in the volumes to be contributed to the present series by Mr. Ritchie and Mr. Adamson respectively. The translation, the work of various hands, is at least as satisfactory as translations usually are. Of course it must always be a question how far paraphrase is admissible, and how far sentences of ten lines or more in length are endurable in English. The present translators seem to have allowed themselves little license in this respect, except, indeed, as to the long adjectival clauses which are the most marked feature of Erdmann's thoroughly professorial style. It is a little surprising to read that Fichte's works came out in sheets, (ii. p. 495), and that he published "certain would-be (sein sollende) atheistic lectures," as if he had made an unsuccessful attempt at atheism instead of being the victim of a groundless charge of it. Still, on the whole, the translation is very satisfactory. It is, perhaps, hypercritical to wish that the papers had been a trifle thicker; but with this exception no fault can be found with the execution of the work, which supplies a want long existing—if frequently unfelt—in England and America.

"ENGLISH AND FOREIGN PHILOSOPHICAL LIBRARY."—The Science of Knowledge and The Science of Rights. By J. G. Fichte, translated from the German by A. E. Kroeger, with a preface by William C. Harris. (Kegan Paul & Co.) In taking up a translation of the works of a philosopher whose followers are extinct, the first question that naturally suggests itself is Cui bono? Whose creed is to receive support, and of what new development are anticipations to be discovered? Fichte is no doubt a philosophical classic; but the moral and mental stimulus he gives is better attainable from his popular works than from a collection of treatises which form a kind of modern parallel to the work of Parmenides. Prof. Harris's introduction—dated from Concord, Massachusetts, the home of American transcendentalism—perhaps supplies the answer. In strange and mystic terminology, which assuredly does not accord with the views of ordinary historians of philosophy, we are told that the study of Kant endows us with a new power of introspection, by which Kant made all his discoveries in psychology. This power was possessed in a yet higher degree by Fichte, the greatest genius in psychology that had ever lived—from whom the reader may obtain the new faculty of seeing pure activity (Science of Knowledge, p. xii., note) as he already sees external beings, from whom he may learn that the one supreme fact in the universe is the free moral will, and from whose conception of that free will he may derive a complete system of political philosophy as set forth in the Science of Rights. In short, the two books before us seem to be (1) an exploitation of Fichte in the interest of a somewhat mystical development of American transcendentalism; (2) an assertion of a reasoned theory of existing society in contrast with Socialism (Science of Rights, Introd., p. ix.). The Science of Knowledge, says Fichte's translator, Mr. Kroeger (Introd., p. xiii.), is not a book to read but a work to study, as you would study the higher mathematics. Read it page by page for five or ten years, and you will have all knowledge. Happily, however, the reviewer's business at present is to criticise Fichte's supporters rather than himself. Now the Science of Knowledge presents an ideal of perfect knowledge—a science whence all knowledge is deducible and whence all scientific laws can be predicted, strange as it may seem, to scientific men (Science of Knowledge, p. 42, note)—an ideal, in short, such as that of which the outline is given in less metaphysical language in the sixth and seventh books of Plato's Republic, though it is not there derived, as it is by Fichte, directly from the individual consciousness. And the vocation of man is to realise in his own consciousness the application of this science—"to realise an infinite ideal and transform the non-ego into his ideal" (Introduction to Science of Knowledge, p. xxiii.). Unfortunately, the effect of the first of these volumes is rather interfered with by a perusal of the second—an exhibition of the deductive method at work on sociology. Here we may learn how in the nature of things every citizen must always carry a passport and produce it whenever he wants to cash a cheque; how criminals must be branded and go into the wilderness; why all pedestrians ought to carry lanterns at night (p. 378); how polyandry—which, as we now know inductively, has existed half round the globe (the phrase is McLennan's)—"is utterly against nature and therefore very rare" (p. 407); how the wife is to be so absorbed in her husband's personality that she may cast his vote, yet nevertheless divorce by consent is permissible; and various other interesting details of the Sociology, nominally deduced from the nature of things, really derived from Fichte's own experience of German bureaucracy and from German sentiment and practice, and supported by reasons suggested by utilitarianism in disguise, but the utilitarianism of the unpractical recluse. To the same action of the environment we may refer Fichte's dream of an Ephorate—a supervision by the best and wisest which was to be the sole security for the maintenance of the constitution—as well as the doctrine of the separation of powers, the social compact, and all the ordinary stock-in-trade of the political philosophers of the eighteenth century. As a pure ideal, never to be applied to existing facts, the scheme of Fichte is, no doubt, noble and inspiring. But its practical applications are an admirable illustration of the practical valueness of Absolute Ethics. If anything can convince the reader of the desirability of such an ideal and its futility except as an ideal, it is the perusal of these two volumes. Mr. Kroeger has done his work of translation and occasional annotation well, though we are not sure that part of it was worth doing at all. Prof. Harris seems to hope that the doctrines of the Science of Rights may be turned to account in confuting Socialism. But Fichte, while deducing rights of property from the existence of the ego, left it to the law to decide what is and what is not property; and this is precisely the question in dispute. It is curious, however, that Fichte, while apparently restoring and re-synthesising the commonplaces of eighteenth century individualism, should have really been the first to make explicit that conception of the Absolute Ego which would seem to have served as the leading element in the philosophical basis of Socialism.

Manual of Empirical Psychology as an Inductive Science. A Text-book for High Schools and Colleges. By Dr. Gustav Adolf Lindner, of Prague. Translated by Charles De Garmo. (Boston, U.S.: Heath.) This book gives one to think on the desirability of teaching so highly speculative a science as psychology to boys at school or even to junior students at the university. Dr. Lindner professes, indeed, to base his work on facts; and the translator, in his amusingly enthusiastic introduction, vouches that it "begins with experience and never gets away from it." Yet, when the reader finds that the work positively bristles with the most abstruse Herbartian hypotheses, including all the supposed mechanism of struggle and mutual arrest of concepts, he may be able to judge of the empirical and inductive character of the work. The fact is, the book was written more than twenty-five years ago; and, though it may have appeared inductive by the side of some of its predecessors, it looks highly speculative to-day in the light of all the newer experimental research, of which it knows next to nothing. It may as well be said at once that the translation of this work for educational uses is a huge blunder, only less regrettable than the placing of Kirchner's Catechism of Psychology, recently translated in this country, into the hands of the young student. It may be doubted whether English youth or maiden of sixteen or seventeen (we speak not of those north of the Tweed) can with advantage take up psychology at all. And however this be, it is certain that if they are to do so they require a far less technical and less speculative work than either of these. The reading of such can only end in a verbal retention of certain formulae, the real nature and proof of which are not investigated. In addition to the amount of speculative hypothesis it contains, Lindner's Manual is unscientific in other ways. It begins with the staggering definition of sensation as "a concept or perception of the soul." Its whole account of perception, which it first identifies with sensation (p. 32), then with discrimination (p. 39), and lastly with the power of objective reference or mental projection (p. 68), is about as hopeless a specimen of muddle as one can find even in psychological literature. Almost the same can be said about the account of the bodily or organic sensations ("vital sense"), which are again and again spoken of as identical with muscular sensations. One cannot help suspecting that the editor or printer must be responsible for some of the more glaring confusions. For the rest, the book is "veraltet." This is seen more particularly in the account of sensation, and its psychological conditions, which is in more than one place positively inaccurate, and in others sadly defective. While, however, thus protesting in the most emphatic way against making what the translator calls "this great and good book" the medium of conveying to guileless youth the vain supposition of accurate knowledge, we may, notwithstanding, thank Prof. Chas. De Garmo for his translation. We have not too many specimens of the Herbartian psychology in English, and Lindner is in some respects well fitted to bring home to the inheritor of English psychological traditions the strong and the weak side of a manner of psychologising which is at once so near to and so far from his own. More especially the account of the feelings and of the will is to be recommended as supplementary to, and in some ways a distinct improvement upon, the current English treatment of the subject.

Geschichte der Philosophie. Von W. Windelband. Erste Lieferung. (London: Williams & Norgate. Freiburg I. B.: Mohr.) We are in danger, thinks Dr. Windelband, of allowing in our history of philosophy the philosophy to be obscured by the history. The minute study of special questions has gone so far that it is time for a general conspectus to be written afresh. The conspectus must give an account of the thinkers themselves; it must consider the absolute value of their ideas; and it must trace the genesis of those ideas, showing their dependence upon earlier stages of thought, upon the notions and feelings of the day, and upon the personality of the thinker himself. But it must, especially in the last division, be careful against overloading the subject with erudition. Given, then, this plan, how shall we present the views which we have to display? Especially have the earlier Greek theories a feeling of strangeness for us which can only be overcome by considerable skill in presentation. Shall we put them forth as they appeared to the thinker and his disciples? Shall we put ourselves in his place, limit ourselves as he was limited, forget what has been learned since, and make his view once more live and seem plausible by looking at it only with his eyes, and seeing only the considerations which lead to it? This seems to us the better plan, as well as the more dramatically true. The way really to learn philosophy is to pass through the stages of thought which our predecessors travelled, and only thus can we fairly pass through them. Dr. Windelband, however, has chosen another plan; and, though we do not think it the best, we must admit that he has carried it out with great success. He prefers to stand by the side of his thinker, to overlook him, to point out where he is going wrong, on what presuppositions he is consciously or unconsciously resting, and where his logic is in fault. On this method we shall never be so entirely at one with our master for the time being as if we were content not to look at him from our position of advantage; but we shall learn a great deal—more, perhaps, of the history of ideas than of philosophy itself, though Dr. Windelband thinks otherwise.

NOTES AND NEWS.

AN interesting discovery of MSS., consisting chiefly of court rolls of the manor of Stanhoe, has recently been made at Barwick, near King's Lynn, in Norfolk, the residence of Mrs. Seymour. The rolls, of which the earliest is dated 4 Henry IV., are continued (with considerable gaps) down to the reign of Charles II., the records during the Commonwealth being, as usual, in English. With them were found a number of documents relating to grants of land, leases, &c., dating from 48 Edward III. down to the beginning of the last century.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN announce an account of the rise and progress of Mahdism, and of subsequent events in the Soudan down to the present time, by Major F. R. Wingate, of the Royal Artillery, now serving with the Egyptian army. The book will be illustrated with ten maps.

MR. LEWIS MORRIS's new poem A Vision of Saints will be published by Messrs. Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner & Co., on November 10. It ranges over all the Christian centuries and ends with Father Damien, who died only last year. St. Francis of Assisi and John Bunyan, St. Catherine of Siena and Elizabeth Fry, are among the saints described. The metre is blank verse.

MR. JOHN MURRAY has in the press a new Baronetage, written by Mr. Robert Dennis, whose name may be remembered as the author of Industrial Ireland. His forthcoming work is described as "a history, a criticism, and a vindication." It will give all ascertained facts as to the foundation of the order, together with curious particulars about the varied fortunes of certain titles and their holders.

MESSRS. LONGMANS will publish next week, in one volume, the story of Ulysses, and Helen, and Moses in Egypt—the joint work of Mr. Haggard and Mr. Lang—which has been appearing as a serial in the New Review.

MR. R. H. PORTER, the well-known scientific publisher, has in the press The Story of the Rear-Column of the Emin Pasha Relief Expedition, by the late James S. Jameson, edited by his widow. The book will have a portrait and about one hundred illustrations, engraved by Mr. C. Whympster from drawings of the author.

A BIOGRAPHY of the late Sir William McArthur, religious, parliamentary, municipal, commercial, by Mr. Thomas McCullagh, will be published about Christmas by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton.

MESSRS. SWAN SONNENSCHNEIN & Co. will publish next January a translation, by Mr. Keatley Moore and Mme. Michaelis, of Froebel's Letters, forming an appendix to their edition of his Autobiography. The Letters are of special interest, as showing the Kindergarten system in its actual course of formation and development.

A CORNISH romance, by Mr. J. H. Pearce, entitled "Esther Pentreath; or, The Miller's Daughter," will be published immediately, in one volume, by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin. The story deals with the superstitions and perils of the mining life.

MESSRS. TRISCHLER & Co. will publish immediately a story dealing with both religious and economical questions of the day, in a sensational form—as may be judged from the title, which is The Decline and Fall of the British Empire; or, The Witch's Cavern. The book will be issued simultaneously in America.

MR. GEORGE CLINCH, of the British Museum, has for some time past been engaged upon an historical account of Marylebone and St. Pancras, in the treatment of which he has followed much the same lines as in his recently published Bloomsbury and St. Giles's. The book, which is to be elaborately illustrated, will be published early in December by Messrs. Truslove and Shirley.

MR. TOM C. SMITH, the historian of more than one Lancashire town, is now engaged upon a history of the parish church of Preston, based mainly upon the registers, the churchwardens' accounts, and the minutes of the body styled "the gentlemen and twenty-four" of the parish. These last go back to the year 1644, and are full of valuable information about the local affairs under the Commonwealth. The volume will contain a map, plans, and other illustrations.

A NEW history of Kidderminster, by Mr. J. R. Burton, is in the press, and will be issued very shortly by Mr. Elliot Stock.

A LECTURE recently delivered by Prof. George Stephens, of Copenhagen, dealing with the question "Is English a German Language?" will be published immediately in pamphlet form by Messrs. Allen and Storr, of Paternoster-square. The professor argues against the received view, favouring rather an Old-Norse parentage. A Danish translation of the pamphlet has been prepared by Mr. Jón Stefánsson.

The Care of the Sick at Home and in the Hospital, a handbook for families and for nurses, by the German surgeon, Dr. Billroth, has been translated into English by Mr. J. Bentall Endean, and will be published shortly by Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston & Co.

THE next volume in the series of "Great Writers" will be Sheridan, written by Mr. Lloyd Sanders.

THE subscription list of London City, written by the Rev. W. J. Loftie, and illustrated by Mr. W. Luker, will be closed on November 17. The Leadenhall Press hope to have the book ready for issue to subscribers before the end of the year.

THE first edition of Miss Maggie Browne's fairy story, Wanted—a King, with illustrations by Mr. Harry Furniss, has already been exhausted; and a second edition will soon be ready for publication.

A SECOND edition of Mrs. Brightwen's Wild Nature won by Kindness has also been called for and will be ready immediately. The re-issue will contain additional matter.

MR. FITZGERALD MOLLOY will begin a series of papers, which he calls "The Faiths of the Peoples," in next Sunday's New York Herald. The articles will deal with the services of various churches in London.

A BIOGRAPHY of Thomas Miller, the basket maker poet, is now appearing in the "Local Notes and Queries" column of the Nottinghamshire Guardian.

AT a meeting held last Friday at Norfolk House, it was resolved to invite subscriptions towards a Newman memorial fund. The objects of the fund are threefold: (1) a statue of the cardinal, on a site to be determined hereafter; (2) a pecuniary provision for maintaining a high standard of education at the Oratory School, founded by the cardinal himself at Edgbaston—a work particularly dear to his heart, and for the well-being and permanence of which he expressed the most anxious solicitude; (3) to promote and perpetuate the study of the cardinal's works by the endowment of a scholarship or prize, or otherwise, the benefits of the scheme being open to persons of every religious profession. Subscribers are at liberty to allot their subscription to any one of these objects. The chairman of the committee is the Duke of Norfolk; and among the members are Lord Coleridge, Lord Tennyson, the provost of Oriel and the president of Trinity College, Oxford, and Mr. R. H. Hutton. The hon. secretary is Mr. W. H. Lilly, 10, Duke-street, St. James's.

THE Aristotelian Society opens its twelfth session on Monday next, November 3. The president, Mr. Shadworth H. Hodgson, has chosen for the subject of his annual address "The Laws of Association." Papers are promised from Mr. R. B. Haldane on "The Categories of Scientific Method," from Mr. Bernard Bosanquet on "Hellenic Theory concerning the beautiful," and from Mr. G. F. Stout on "Guyau's Philosophy of Idea-forces;" and the "Heredity as a Factor in Knowledge" will be treated in the form of a symposium by Messrs. Alexander, Bosanquet, and Ritchie.

MR. CHARLES EDWARD MUDIE, the founder of the world-famous library that bears his name, died at Hampstead, on Tuesday, October 28, in the seventy-third year of his age. He had retired some little while ago from the active management of the business.

UNIVERSITY JOTTINGS.

MR. WALTER PATER, who has been chosen to deliver the annual Taylorian lecture at Oxford in connexion with modern European literature, has taken for his subject "Prosper Mérimée." The lecture will be delivered on Saturday, November 15.

THE senate at Cambridge has approved a report from the general board of studies, raising the status of Mr. Adam Sedgwick from that of university lecturer to a readership in animal morphology; but his salary remains at £100.

SIR FREDERICK POLLOCK, the Corpus professor of jurisprudence at Oxford, will deliver a public lecture on Saturday next, November 8, upon "The Origins of the Common Law."

MR. W. R. MORFILL, reader in Slavonic at Oxford, is delivering a course of lectures this term on "Russian Novelists." The first of these, which was to be given to-day, dealt with Nicholas Gogol.

AT the annual meeting of the Cambridge Philosophical Society on Monday, October 27, the president, Mr. J. Willis Clark, delivered an address, giving a history of the origin and early years of the society; and Dr. Arthur Gamgee read a paper on "The Principle upon which Fahrenheit constructed his Thermometrical Scale."

THE new wings of the Oxford University Galleries, containing the collection of casts of ancient Greek sculpture, coins, and inscriptions, which had been re-arranged and greatly extended under the care of Prof. Percy Gardner, were formally opened on October 19. On the same occasion the four portrait-sketches painted by the Slade professor of fine art, Mr. Herbert Herkomer, as a demonstration at his lectures, each being the work of six hours, were exhibited. They are now open to the inspection of visitors in the professor's studio, adjoining the galleries.

ACCORDING to the lists of the registry, the total number of matriculations at Cambridge this term amounts to 865, showing a slight decrease as compared with last year. Of these, only 19 were sizars—at Trinity, Corpus, and Emmanuel. The large colleges stand in the following order:—Trinity, 186; St. John's, 83; Trinity Hall, 73; Clare and Caius, each 58; Pembroke, 52; Emmanuel, 48; Christ's, 44; and Jesus, 39.

THE Oxford Magazine for October 29 contains a long article signed D. G. H., which gives the first account that has appeared of the writer's archaeological tour in Asia Minor last summer, in company with Prof. W. M. Ramsay. The principal result here mentioned is the copying of the inscriptions discovered by Mr. Theodore Bent on the site of Olba, and at the Corycian cave, in Cilicia. We hope that a further instalment will tell us something about the new Hittite monuments which the party afterwards found in Cappadocia.

Dr. F. R. JOPP, assistant-professor at the School of Mines, has been elected to the chair of chemistry at Aberdeen, vacant by the death of Prof. Cornelly.

AT the opening lectures of the Arts classes at Edinburgh last week, Prof. Butcher took for his special subject "The Melancholy of the Greeks"; Prof. Masson, "The Journal of Sir Walter Scott"; and Prof. Calderwood, "Hypnotism."

ORIGINAL VERSE.

ST. MARTIN'S SUMMER.

"The lightning before death. . . ."

I.

'Tis Autumn. . . . How the world is hush'd!
Does it forebode the end?
Never! for every tree and plant
Wears motley, gay—extravagant—
Such as the hopeful, young, all-conquering Spring,
Array'd in tenderest green,
Dame Nature's darling, grudged not anything,
Hath neither dream'd nor seen!

II.

Yet, even as now
The world of lifeless things grows fair,
Setting the crown of beauty on its brow,
In the hush'd autumnal air:
So I, when watching by the bed of death,
Have known the clouded mind grow clear,
Have miss'd the trouble from the vex'd breath,
And said, The end is near!

OBITUARY.

SIR RICHARD BURTON, K.C.M.G.

II.

WHILE attempting, last week, to sketch the career and character of Sir Richard Burton, we made scant reference to his published works. At the moment, it was natural to think more of the man we had lost than of the books that will hand down his name to a generation that knew him not. For the only true immortality is that of literature, whether gained by one's own pen or conferred by a vates sacer. Before the judgment-seat of posterity, mere quantity avails nothing; rather, it has a tendency to submerge its producer altogether. But Burton, though undoubtedly he wrote far too much, has no less certainly left some things which will entitle him to a place whenever the roll of Victorian authors is called over.

Within a period of less than forty years, Burton put forth more than fifty volumes, some of considerable dimensions. Most of these were narratives of travel, describing his own adventures, the condition of society, and the aspects of nature, in almost every quarter of the globe, from furthest East to furthest West, from the equator to the arctic circle. Books of travel, however, not excluding those that are the talk of a London season, are condemned by their very nature to but brief popularity. Their successors rapidly sweep them away to that limbo of literature, the catalogue of "remainders." Who now reads Cook, or Bruce? Even the great name of Livingstone is already growing shadowy. It is a notable fact that Burton's Lake Regions of Equatorial Africa (2 vols. 1860), which depicted with extraordinary vividness the opening of a route that has since become historic, never reached a second edition. Warned by repeated teachings, Burton seems to have resolved that, to win lasting reputation, he must attempt a different walk of literature. The three works on which his fame as an author will ultimately rest were all published—we do not say, written—within the last ten years of his life, when rest from travel allowed him to draw upon the crowded experience of his early days, and to take up again for revision MSS. long laid by. These three works are—the Camoens (six vols., 1880-1884); The Book of the Sword (1884); and The Arabian Nights (16 vols., 1885-1888).

Burton himself tells how he was first attracted to Camoens on his visit to Goa in 1847, and how the poems were afterwards a solace to him during his long exile in the Lusitanian colonies of Western Africa and Brazil. His own life of heroic wandering naturally led him to sympathise with the spirit of the one modern work that may stand comparison with the Odyssey. And there was much in common between the two men. Both had seen and suffered much; both were ardent patriots, and inspired by the genius of antique chivalry; both endured the bitterest of disappointments without becoming soured. Sympathy, so deep and so wide as this, is the first qualification needed by a translator. There was added perfect mastery of the language, and unrivalled familiarity with the times. Granted, that Burton was not himself a poet. All that he claims is that his knack of picking up languages had taught him the cognate knack of turning one language into another. Of some translations it is said, by way of commendation, that they do not read like translations; of others, as of Fitzgerald's Omar Khayyam, that they surpass their originals. Neither praise would have been desired by Burton. His aim was to present to English readers ignorant of Portuguese as much as might be of the effect which Camoens has exercised for three centuries upon the Portuguese themselves, not to turn Camoens into an English poet of to-day. With this object, he set himself to the task of grappling resolutely with every difficulty in his text, and of compelling his native tongue to adapt itself to foreign idioms. Not only the metre and the vigorous rhetorical style, but even the not infrequent archaisms and harshnesses, have been preserved with marvellous fidelity. What to the unimaginative may appear only a gigantic tour de force was at once recognised by scholars as touching, if not always maintaining, the high-water mark of true translation.

Burton did not conceal his disappointment at the cold reception which The Book of the Sword met with from the public, especially from reviewers, though we venture to anticipate that a future generation will reverse the contemporary verdict. Despite the advantages of handsome print and numerous illustrations, this monograph tell almost still-born from the press. As originally designed, it was to fill three volumes, giving a history of the sword and its use in all countries from the earliest times. Unfortunately, the first volume, which has alone appeared, was confined to the archaeology of the subject; and in archaeology Burton (like his friend Mr. Du Chaillu) took a perverse pleasure in being heterodox. Though this volume is crammed with sufficient erudition to make the reputation of a professor, and is penetrated with theories which subsequent research is as likely to confirm as to refute, it remains but a splendid torso. We have lost, at least for the present, the remainder of the work, which was to treat of the sword during the middle ages, and to relate the history of the art of fencing, with a copious bibliography.

Of The Arabian Nights not much need be said. As a translation, the work is marked by the same features as the Camoens, save that it reads more smoothly. Like the Camoens, it gives evidence of the wonderful degree in which Burton had entered into the spirit of an alien language and into the forms of thought and habits of a different civilisation. It was intended by the author to be a legacy to his countrymen of the results of his own oriental experiences, which are not likely to be repeated. He meant to teach them how far the East is from the West, and how little the East has changed from time immemorial. The supreme importance of England's rule over India, and the neglect by Englishmen of their responsibilities, were subjects upon which Burton was never weary of dwelling. His own special interests lay not with Hinduism, but with Islam. As regards that branch of the question, he has achieved his object—that no one henceforth can plead ignorance of what manner of men Muhammadans are.

MAGAZINES AND REVIEWS.

AMONG the various articles in the November number of the Expositor, some eloquent and all adapted to the wants of a thoughtful orthodoxy, there are two which deserve mention here. The Dean of Peterborough might have written more effectively on the relation of the cosmogony in Gen. i. to mythology on the one hand and to modern science on the other; but he lets us see that his sympathies are not with the old-fashioned view of the historical or even quasi-historical character of this fine Haggadah. In particular, he is "not concerned to make out any harmony between Gen. i. and the discoveries of modern science;" all his interest is in the religious ideas which Gen. i. embodies. This is the opening article. Third on the list is Prof. Nöldeke's review of Prof. Margoliouth's various papers on the composition of Ecclesiasticus, already summarised in the ACADEMY; it is followed by an "additional note" from the Laudian professor, and a postscript from Prof. Nöldeke.

THE Jewish Quarterly Review for October treats of somewhat dry subjects in an interesting as well as instructive style. The doctrine of divine retribution forms the subject of what is happily not called a symposium. The forms taken by this idea in the Old Testament, the New Testament, and Rabbinical literature are explained by Mr. C. G. Montefiore, the Rev. J. E. Odgers, and Mr. S. Schechter respectively. Mr. Dow draws a parallel and a contrast between the Hebrew and the Puritan, protesting against such an enlarged meaning of the term "Puritan" as is favoured by J. R. Green, the historian. Mr. Henriquez supplements Mrs. Lucas's recent article on religious education by a treatment of some serious difficulties which Mrs. Lucas avoided, connected with the doubtful historicity of many parts of the Old Testament. Dr. Chotzner gives a sketch of a modern Hebrew humourist (Isaac Erter). The Rev. Morris Joseph discusses preaching from a Jewish point of view. Mr. Montefiore gives a friendly review of Hunter's After the Exile. Prof. Grätz points out some internal evidence in the Septuagint version of the Pentateuch for assigning it to the reign of Ptolemy Philometor; and Dr. Kaufmann interprets one of the most obscure of the Merton College Shtaroth, edited by Dr. Neubauer.

MR. STANLEY AT CAMBRIDGE.

THE following is the speech delivered by the public orator, Dr. Sandys, in presenting Mr. H. M. Stanley for the honorary degree of LL.D., at Cambridge, on Thursday last, October 23:

"In hoc ipso loco, fere tres et triginta abhinc annos, senatus frequens Africae causam Britannorum virtuti egregie commendantem Livingstonium audivit. Hodie vero non minore animi alacritate virum insignem adspicimus, qui Livingstonium, Africae in penetralibus diu abditum, amicorum e conspectu diu abreptum, non minus fortiter quaesitum ivit quam feliciter reperit; qui postea viri illius immortalis reliquias gloriae Britannicae in templo depositas veneratione debita prosecutus est: qui nuper denique ab Africa totiens perlustrata maxima cum laude reversus, templo in eodem, nuptiarum suarum auspiciatissimo die, viri tanti sepulchrum flore coronae munere ornare non est oblitus. Interim Africa in peragrandia quot pericula quam fortiter toleraverat! Viderat olim Britannorum arma et in orientali et in occidentali Africae parte imperatorum illustrium ductu triumphantia; idem postea eadem in tellure pacis triumphos virtutibus vere imperatoris auxit. Quod imperatoris Romani Gnaei Pompeii inter laudes Tullius commemorat, idem de hoc viro multo verius praedicare possumus:—'Africam exploravit.' Quod si factorum eius insignium testes quaeritis, oratoris eiusdem eodem de imperatore verba usurpaverim: 'Testis est Africa.' Testis profecto est Africa, cuius amnes immensos superavit, cuius silvas luce maligna obscuras et barbarorum sagittis venenatis formidolosos penetravit, cuius lacus denique ingentes montesque nivibus perpetuis oblectos accuratissime observavit. Idem, velut alter Hannibal, rerum naturae in claustris diffringendis, etiam ipsas rupes perrupisse perhibetur. Quid dicam de pygmaeorum gente a scriptoribus antiquis olim commemorata et ab hoc viro in latebris eius silvestribus denuo detecta? Quid de Lunae montibus, non iam fabularum incertarum nube involutis sed veritatis luce nunc demum illustratis? Quid de Nili origine, inter lacus magnos Ptolemaeo non ignotos etiam amplius patefacta? Nestis verba a poeta Romano Caesari quondam in Aegypto tributa? 'spes sit mihi certa videndi Nilivae fontes, bellum civile relinquam.' Regionem igitur quam Caesar, Britannorum victor, cernere nequiquam exoptavit, eandem gentis Britannicae alumnus, Cambria in nostra natus et fratribus nostris transmarinis postea adscriptus, comitum fortium et fidelium cum auxilio, fide indomita, perseverantia indefessa, fortitudine intrepida victor obivit. Qui salutem aliis audacter obtulit, eum ipsum hodie ex animo iubemus salvere."

THE QUARREL BETWEEN TURGENIEV AND TOLSTOI.

PUSHKIN fell in a duel in 1836. Lermontov fell in a duel in 1841. In May, 1861, it seemed that the chronic hostility between Turgenev and Count Lyef Tolstoi would involve one of them in a like fate. Though they were nominally friends for years, and belonged to the same literary coterie, the antagonism of their natures was continually finding expression in letters like Tolstoi's criticism of On The Eve*; and in spite of the sweetness of Turgenev's nature, he sometimes breaks out bitterly against Tolstoi's tendencies and convictions. After the death of Nicolai Tolstoi, whom Turgenev loved as a brother, the sense of common misfortune caused a partial reconciliation between Lyef Tolstoi and Turgenev. The poet Shenshin (A. A. Phet) has recently made public some letters† from which the true history of the reconciliation, and the events which followed it, may be gathered. After Nicolai Tolstoi's death, Shenshin tried to confirm the reconciliation of the two novelists, by contriving a meeting between them at his house. The invitation came to Tolstoi through Turgenev, who writes to Shenshin:

"May 19, 1861.

"Fettie carissime, I send you a note from Tolstoi; I wrote to him to-day that he must absolutely come here next week, to invade you with our united forces in your Stepanovka‡, while the nightingales still sing, and the spring smiles, 'serene, and blissfully indifferent.' I hope he will hear my prayer, and come. At all events, expect me towards the end of next week, and till then, farewell. Remember Goethe's words, 'Ohne Hast, ohne Rast,' and don't overwork yourself and look on your orphaned Muse, though only with one eye. My salutations to your wife.

"Your devoted Ivan Turgenev."

This letter contained a note from Lyef Tolstoi to Shenshin:

"... I wish much to see Ivan Sergëevitch, but twenty times more to see you. It is such a long time since we met, and so much has happened to us both. Your farming activity rejoices me without end when I hear and think about it, and flatters my pride, because I contributed to it, though only to a small degree. . . ."

The two novelists arrived at Shenshin's house a few days later. What happened there had better be told in Shenshin's own words. He prefaces his story by saying:

"Turgenev acknowledged that he alone was to blame in the dispute, and even his worst enemy could not accuse Tolstoi, the holder of the fourth bastion§ of cowardice. Tolstoi was so altered afterwards, and the meaning of the event so changed for him, that he was the first to stretch out the hand of peace.

"In the morning, at our usual time, nine o'clock, our guests came to the dining-room, where my wife sat by the samovar, and I, in expectation of coffee, sat at the other end of the table. Turgenev sat on my wife's right hand, and Tolstoi on the left. Knowing the importance Turgenev at that time ascribed to the education of his daughter, my wife asked him whether he was satisfied with his English governess. Turgenev began to sing her praises, and among other things said that the governess had asked him, with English exactitude, how much his daughter might spend in charity. 'Now,' said Turgenev, 'she wants my daughter to collect the ragged clothes of the poor and mend them.'

"And you consider that to be good?" asked Tolstoi.

"Of course! it brings the charitable person closer to the poor," replied Turgenev.

"And I think," said Tolstoi, "that a well-dressed girl who takes the dirty rags in her lap acts an insincere and theatrical part."

"I request you not to say so!" said Turgenev, with quivering nostrils.

"Why should I not say what I am convinced of?" answered Tolstoi.

"I had no time to interpose," continues Shenshin, "when Turgenev said, pale with anger: 'Then I will force you to silence by an insult!' With these words he rose from the table; then suddenly clasped his hands excitedly over his face and left the room. After a moment he came back, and said, addressing my wife:

"I beseech you to forgive my rudeness; I am deeply sorry for it." Then he withdrew. Understanding that the two late friends could no longer remain together, I ordered separate carriages for them."

The same day Turgenev wrote to Tolstoi as follows:

"Respected Lyef Nicolaiévitch,

"In answer to your letter, I can only repeat what I thought it my duty to tell you at Phet's: drawn on by the feeling of unwilling dislike, the cause of which it would be out of place to discuss, I offended you without any sufficient provocation on your part, and apologised. What happened this morning proved that all attempts at intimacy between such dissimilar natures as ours can lead to no good. I pay my debt the more willingly as the present letter is, in all probability, the last shred of any relation between us. From the bottom of my soul I hope it may satisfy you, and I give my consent beforehand to any use you may make of it. With fullest respect,

"I have the honour to remain,

"your humble servant,

"IVAN TURGENIEV.

"Spaskoe, 27th May, 1861.

"P.S.—10½ p.m., Ivan Petrovitch has just brought my letter, which my servant very stupidly sent to Novoselki, instead of to Bogoslov. I humbly ask you to forgive this unexpected and disagreeable blunder. I hope that my messenger will find you in Bogoslov."

Tolstoi sent this letter to Shenshin, with the following endorsement:

"... I could not avoid opening one more letter from Iv. Turgenev, replying to mine. I wish you luck in your future relations with that man, but I despise him, and wrote to him, breaking off all relations with him, unless he should send me a challenge. In spite of my apparent calmness, I was much disturbed, and I felt I must request a more definite apology from him, as I did in my letter from Novoselki. Here is his letter, with which I am satisfied; I replied only that the reason which makes me pardon him is not the dissimilarity of our natures, but another, which he understands. Besides that, because of the delay, I sent him another letter, cruel enough, and containing a challenge, to which I got no answer. If I receive a reply I shall send it back unopened, so that is the end of this pitiful story, which, if it passes the threshold of your house, must pass it with this addition.

"LYEF TOLSTOI."

Unfortunately, the pitiful story was not quite ended; and, although up to this point Tolstoi certainly comes out of it best, in spite of his very ungenerous estimate of his former friend, yet subsequent events tell very strongly in favour of Turgenev. From the first Turgenev deeply regretted his outburst of anger, and acknowledged his culpability. In the following letter he again confesses his fault, and offers Tolstoi all the reparation in his power:

"... Your servant says you require an answer to your letter, but I do not see what I can add to what I have already written, save that I acknowledge your right to demand satisfaction from me in a duel, though you preferred to be satisfied with my expressed and repeated apology. Speaking quite sincerely, I would willingly have borne your fire to atone for my mad utterance. The fact that I expressed it is so far from the habits of my whole life that I can only attribute it to irritation called forth by the extreme and continual antagonism of our opinions. This is not an apology, but an explanation. Such events are irreparable and irrevocable, and, therefore, in taking my leave of you finally, I think it my duty to repeat once more that in this dispute you were in the right, and I was in the wrong. In saying this, it is not a question of my courage, but of your right to call me out—in due form, of course, with seconds—as well as your right to pardon me. You chose the course you preferred, and I had only to submit to your decision. Once more I ask you to receive the expression of my complete respect.

"IVAN TURGENIEV."

This letter is undated, but it is evident that it is a reply to the challenge Tolstoi sent when the already explained delay in receiving Turgenev's former letter made him think an apology was refused by Turgenev. If the matter had stopped here, Tolstoi's reputation for magnanimity would have been higher. It must be remembered that Tolstoi had expressed his intention of returning all further letters from Turgenev unopened, after the delay of the first apology had been satisfactorily explained. He read this letter, however, and made the following comment on it in a letter to Shenshin:

"... Turgenev is a . . . , which I request you to convey to him as accurately as you convey his charming aphorisms to me, in spite of my repeatedly requesting you not to talk about him.

"COUNT LYEF TOLSTOI.

"P.S.—I must request you not to write to me any more, for I shall neither open your letters, nor Turgenev's."

The insult in this letter, and the way it was uttered, redound very little to Tolstoi's credit; his conduct was clearly unfair, and we are afraid we must add ungentlemanly, as Turgenev had not only apologised fully and repeatedly, but had given Tolstoi the option of fighting, if he was not satisfied with the apology. Clearly, Tolstoi should either have accepted the apology or fought, and the abuse in this letter is quite unjustifiable. The affair seems to have stopped here, so far as Turgenev is concerned, till some time in November, when he was on his way to France. He himself describes what then took place, in a letter to Shenshin, dated from Paris, on November 8, 1861:

"... à propos, one last word about the ill-omened story with Tolstoi. On my way through St. Petersburg I heard from reliable people [oh! these reliable people] that copies of Tolstoi's last letter to me (the letter in which he 'despises' me) were circulating in Moscow, copies said to be distributed by Count Tolstoi himself. This made me mad, and I sent him a challenge from here for the time when I shall return to Russia. Tolstoi answered me that this distribution of copies was a pure invention, and sent me a letter repeating all the details of my offence, in which he begs my pardon, and gives up all idea of challenging me. Of course, the affair must stop here . . . ."

These letters to Tolstoi give no idea of the charm of Turgenev's usual epistolary style, though there is an echo of that charm in the letters to Shenshin, even when Turgenev's mind was troubled by his quarrel with Tolstoi. In his other letters there is a continual play of wit, humour, profundity, and pathos, and sometimes he breaks out into musical verse only more delightful than his prose. There is no doubt that the "golden-tongued" Turgenev will rank as one of the best letter-writers in all literature.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"AS JUST AS A SQUIRE."

Cambridge: Oct. 18, 1890.

This proverbial phrase occurs in Chaucer, Somn. Tale, Group D, 2090.

"Thou shalt me finde as just as is a squire."

There is no explanation of this in any of the editions, by which I mean those by Tyrwhitt, Morris, Wright, Bell, and Gilman. Probably they took squire in the ordinary sense!

But squire means here a square, or T-square, as explained in my Dictionary; "as just as a squire" is much the same thing as "as right as a trivet," or "right to a T." The Somnour is praising his own uprightness.

I give in my Dictionary references to Shakspeare and to Floriz and Blanchaflur; add—Spenser, F. Q. ii. 1. 58; Romaunt of the Rose, 7066; Minshew's Dictionary. Cotgrave gives: "A l'esquierre, justly, directly, evenly, straightly; by line and levell, to a haire." Godefroy, s. v. esquarre, refers us to the O.F. translation of 1 Kings v. 17: "e que tuz fussent taillie a esquire."

WALTER W. SKEAT.

"IL SEMPLICE LOMBARDO" IN PURG. XVI.

Stanhoe Grange, Norfolk: October 18, 1890.

In speaking of the degenerate state into which Lombardy had fallen after the wars between Frederick II. and the Lombard towns, Dante says that there yet survive three old men whose lives are a reproach to the "young generation":—

"Ben v'en tre vecchi ancora, in cui rampogna L'antica età la nuova" (vv. 121-122.)

one of these he says is,

"Guido da Castel, che me' si noma Francescamente il semplice Lombardo."

The usual explanation of this is that the term "Lombard" was a general name in France for an Italian; but this is not much to the point, for, as Mr. Butler remarks, if Guido was a Lombard there is nothing specially French in calling him so.

The term "Lombard," however, had a more special signification in French at that time, viz., usurer—hence our "Lombard-street" and the "Rue des Lombards" in Paris (see Du Cange, s.v. Lungobardi, and the instances given by Godefroy, s.v. Lombard).* Now from a note on this passage in the Optimo Comento it appears that Guido da Castel had a great reputation for hospitality to those who passed by on their way to or from France:

"Messer Guido studio in onorare li valenti uomini, che passavano per lo cammino francesco, e molti ne rimise in cavalli ed armi, che di Francia erano passati di qua; onorevolmente consumate loro facultadi, tornavano meno ad arnesi, ch'a loro non si convenia, a tutti diede, senza speranza di merito (without hope of return), cavalli, arme, danari."

Perhaps, then, the term "il semplice Lombardo" applied to Guido by his French-speaking friends was meant as a playful description of the "honest usurer" who supplied "horses, arms, and money" and never expected any return; if this were so, there would at any rate be some point in the appellation, which there certainly is not according to the ordinary interpretation.

PAGET TOYNBEE.

THE ETYMOLOGY OF "HYPERION."

Lancing College, Shoreham, Sussex: Oct. 25.

The derivation of Ἥπεριον does not seem to be given very definitely in the ordinary books. Curtius only refers to Ἥπερ (Gr. 540); other writers seem silent. Mr. Leaf (Iliad xx. 398) calls the word a "patronymic in form, but probably only a title, like θεοὶ ὀυρανῶνες." But, first, it is no explanation to call a word "patronymic in form." ὀυρανῶνες had a definite meaning, "sons of heaven," and there is no apparent reason why Hyperion should have got his name as being the son of anybody; indeed, it is hard to see what his father would have been called on this hypothesis. Secondly, all the patronymics in -ων make their other cases with a long vowel. Can Ἥπεριον be a comparative of ἥρεος, like καλῶν and the rest? The sense suits; the declension suits; and the suffix suits, for it is an old one, and Ἥπεριον is obviously an old word. Probably, however, this has been suggested before. F. HAVERFIELD.

APPOINTMENTS FOR NEXT WEEK.

SUNDAY, NOV. 2, 4 p.m. South Place Institute: "Representative Modern Composers of Classical Song," with musical illustrations, by Mr. Carl Armbruster.
7.30 p.m. Ethical: "The Future of Religious Observance," by Mr. Bernard Bosanquet.
MONDAY, NOV. 3, 4 p.m. Royal Academy: "The Head and the Face," by Prof. John Marshall.
5 p.m. Royal Institution: General Monthly Meeting.
8 p.m. Aristotelian: Presidential Address, "The Laws of Association," by Mr. Shadworth H. Hodgson.
TUESDAY, NOV. 4, 8 p.m. Biblical Archaeology.
8.30 p.m. Zoological: "The Indian Gaur and its Allies," by Mr. W. T. Blanford; "A New Squirrel from the Philippine Islands," by Dr. A. B. Meyer; "A Cervine Jaw from Algeria," by Mr. R. Lydekker; "The Skull of the East-African Reed-buck (Cervicapra bokor)," by Dr. A. Günther.
WEDNESDAY, NOV. 5, 8 p.m. Elizabethan: "The English Novel in the Time of Shakspeare," by Miss Elizabeth Lee.
THURSDAY, NOV. 6, 4 p.m. Royal Academy: "Chemistry of Painting-Grounds," by Prof. A. H. Church.
4 p.m. Archaeological Institute: "Some Stone and Bronze Implements and some Paints and Colours found by Mr. Petrie in Egypt," by Mr. E. C. J. Spurrell.
8 p.m. Linnæan: "The Relative Effects of different Parts of the Solar Spectrum on the Assimilation of Plants," by Prof. Henslow.
8 p.m. Chemical.
FRIDAY, NOV. 7, 8 p.m. Geologists' Association: Conversation.

SCIENCE.

RECENT WORKS ON PHYSICAL SCIENCE.

The Scientific Papers of James Clerk Maxwell. Edited by W. D. Niven. Vols. I. and II. (Cambridge: University Press.) It is difficult to express sufficiently our gratitude to the Clerk Maxwell Memorial Committee, to the Cambridge Press, and to Mr. W. D. Niven, for these noble quarto volumes, which contain the collected papers of the first Cavendish professor of physics. To write a review of them would be to examine critically the whole field of Clerk Maxwell's activity; and even if such an examination did not exceed the scope proposed for these articles on recent physical science, it would need the width of knowledge and physical insight possessed by few scientists and by none of the usual review writers of to-day. Nor is it possible here to give even a brief summary of the hundred and one papers which these volumes embrace. They include, besides the larger memoirs, a considerable number of the suggestive Encyclopædia articles, and of the more important reviews and biographies from Nature. It is not only the historian, but the student of almost every branch of physics, who will find here collected together material provocative in the highest degree of further research. To sit over these volumes is to experience a growth of enthusiasm, and a bracing of the whole intellectual system, such as only the work of a great philosophical mind can produce; it is to recognise that "the multiplication of symbols" has not "put a stop to the development of ideas;"

it is to long even with feeble powers to labour in the same field, and to sigh because we can only watch the feats of the Titans, and scarcely recognise in ourselves, as we read, even the veriest reflection of their strength. It would be difficult at this date to measure Maxwell's relation to his contemporaries. Mr. Niven, in his graceful but all too brief preface, has made no attempt to do so, and it is obvious that it would be idle to attempt it here. But so much we may remark—that Maxwell's reputation has increased year by year since his death, and stands on the continent to-day as high as that of any contemporary British physicist. The publication of these volumes and their distribution in continental libraries can only strengthen this position in a most marked manner. The keynote to Maxwell's greatness lies in the extent of his creative genius, in his power of developing ideas. His pursuit of ideas was often so hurried that it overran his care in analysis, and many a scientist must look back to-day with almost a shudder on the labour he spent in correcting the analysis of the first edition of the Electricity and Magnetism. But in Maxwell's own words:

"The mind of the mathematician is subject to many disturbing causes, such as fatigue, loss of memory, and hasty conclusions; and it is found that, from these and other causes, mathematicians make mistakes."

The correction of these mistakes forms the often too thankless task of an editor, for few can measure the amount of labour which may be spent in verifying the analysis of even a single memoir. Here, too, we will not criticise, but only express a wish that Mr. Niven had been more generous in the supply of footnotes of the type which he has introduced into the paper entitled "Illustrations of the Dynamical Theory of Gases." Thus, in the youthful paper on "The Equilibrium of Elastic Solids," Cases v. and viii. at least are erroneously dealt with; in the paper on "Reciprocal Figures, Frames and Diagrams of Forces" the treatment of a uniform horizontal beam is inadmissible—as, indeed, is the major portion of Airy's memoir dealing with the like subject; the corrections (due to Sir William Thomson) of the article entitled "Capillary Action" are also important. These and other like points might, we think, have been referred to in warning footnotes. The type, paper, and general correctness of the reprint reflect the highest credit on the University Press; and we will pardon its several past and many possible future sins in the publication of elementary text-books for the sake of these volumes in which both Press and University seem to us to have been fulfilling their real functions from the highest standpoint.

MATHEMATICAL AND PHYSICAL PAPERS. By Sir William Thomson. Vol. III.—Elasticity, Heat, Electro-Magnetism. (Cambridge: University Press.) After the lapse of six years, we have at last the third volume of Sir William Thomson's collected papers; and it is indeed a volume which naturalists—Sir William will not approve of our saying physicists—must congratulate themselves upon. According to the preface, a fourth volume is to contain the Baltimore Lectures, with memoirs on kindred subjects hitherto unpublished, while a fifth will include all that remains of the mathematical and physical papers. But if this fifth volume be delayed twelve years, a sixth and seventh will be needed before the series is complete, for Sir William Thomson's energy and ideas seem to increase rather than decrease with the years. We cannot be too grateful to the University Press for the noble series of reprints (Thomson, Stokes, Cayley, and Maxwell) which is so effectually demonstrating to the scientific world the magnitude of the Cambridge school, and the liberality of its Alma Mater; but we would still urge the Press authorities to keep a printer's devil perpetually on the doorsteps of the presidents of the Royal Societies of both Edinburgh and London. All we can do in this place is to briefly note, with a few comments, the chief contents of the new volume. It consists in part of reprints, in part of hitherto unpublished papers. In the first place, we have the articles on "Elasticity" and "Heat," reprinted from the Encyclopædia Britannica. These have been so long before the public that their many merits and few defects are well known. Everywhere suggestive, they still do not represent, especially on the former subject, the state of our experimental knowledge twelve years later. Our present acquaintance with the laws of set and after-strain render certain portions of the article on elasticity out of date, and the tables of elastic moduli and strengths will hardly satisfy the physicist of to-day. It is somewhat astonishing to find that Young's modulus for ice is more than double that for any known substance; but this is due to the error of an additional cipher which somehow crept into Thomson and Tait's Natural Philosophy, and has been perpetuated here and elsewhere. The old appeal to jelly, caoutchouc, and cork to settle the elastic constant controversy is, for reasons which cannot be given in this place, unsatisfactory; and the final answer must probably be sought for in experiments upon crystals, such as those of Voigt. One word as to an historical misstatement: "Resilience," says Sir William (p. 42), is a very useful word, introduced about forty years ago by Lewis Gordon." This is patriotic to Glasgow, but Borellus has the word in his book, which is more than two hundred years old; and Young, in 1807, used it quite in its modern sense. The papers which follow "Elasticity" and "Heat" deal with the physics of the earth, and notably with its rigidity. Sir William Thomson brings strong arguments against the old view of the earth being a thin solid shell surrounding a liquid kernel. He discusses the effect of the elasticity of the solid earth on the height of the tides, and introduces his paper on elastic spherical shells. In applying elasticity to the physics of the earth, he was indeed following unconsciously in the footsteps of Lamé and Resal; but his method is essentially novel, and his application of it to the tides raised in the solid earth is all and characteristically his own. The remainder of the volume is principally occupied with papers dealing with the constitution of matter and ether; and this, for many readers, will be the most exciting part of the book. It is strange to find Sir William an enthusiastic Boscovichian (pace the "untenable theory" of a certain treatise on Natural Philosophy), and what is more, demonstrating that a system of Boscovichian atoms can lead to bi-constant isotropy! But Sir William's conversion is always accompanied by the discovery of a new side to the old hypothesis. We trust that the publication of the mathematics of this investigation is not postponed to the Greek Kalends. In a paper entitled "Viscous Liquid, Elastic Solid, Ether," now published for the first time, Sir William Thomson supposes an incompressible ether which has no intrinsic rigidity but an inherent resistance to absolute rotation, or has shearing resistance proportional to twist. He shows that such an ether, if rigidly fixed at its boundaries, satisfies equations identical with those of an elastic solid fixed in like fashion, and in this manner really saves from destruction the elastic solid theories of the reflection and refraction of light, &c. His ether too, by acting with regard to boundaries within it subject only to normal pressure as a frictionless incompressible liquid, leaves open a wide field for the explanation of chemical and cohesive force in the vibrations and pulsations of atoms. Here, again, may be many difficulties, but there is hope. The greatest difficulties Sir William considers to lie in electro-static force, Ohm's law, and the ratio of the electro-static to electro-magnetic units.

"All this essentially involves the consideration of ponderable matter permeated by or imbedded in ether, and a tertium quid which we may call electricity, a fluid go-between, serving to transmit force between ponderable matter and ether, and to cause by its flow the molecular motions of ponderable matter which we call heat. I see no way of suggesting properties of matter, of electricity, or of ether, by which all this, or any more than a very slight approach to it, can be done; and I think we must feel at present that the triple alliance—ether, electricity, and ponderable matter—is rather a result of our want of knowledge and of capacity to imagine beyond the limited present horizon of physical science than a reality of nature" (p. 465).

In the next memoir we have a "gyrostatic adynamic" constitution for such an ether as the above described; and the interest of the volume culminates in the reprint of last year's address to the Institution of Electrical Engineers, with its concluding confession of ignorance and words of hope and confidence in the possibility of future knowledge:

"I cannot doubt but that these things, which now seem to us so mysterious, will be no mysteries at all; that the scales will fall from our eyes; that we shall learn to look on things in a different way—when that which is now a difficulty will be the only common-sense and intelligible way of looking at the subject" (p. 511).

This is the true faith of science in all departments: namely, that one day there will be light; and that, meanwhile, patient waiting and working, without cloaking of ignorance, is a sufficient creed of life for all her devotees.

SOME BOOKS ON ASSYRIOLOGY.

Babylonian and Assyrian Cylinder-Seals and Signs in the possession of Sir Henry Peek, Bart. By Theo. G. Pinches. (Privately printed.) The catalogue of this interesting little collection has been prepared by Mr. Pinches with his usual learning and accuracy. In a short Introduction he gives a sketch of the different periods which may be distinguished in the history of the art of seal-engraving in Babylonia—the first, from about 4000 to about 2600 B.C., of which the artistic character seems to be wholly Semitic, and to which belong Nos. 1 and 3 of the present collection; the second marked by Accadian influence, and by the preference of the craftsmen for devotional rather than heroic subjects; and the third, extending from about 1000 to about 400 B.C., in which the Semitic character reappears, though not without a strong admixture of Accadian elements. The most interesting of the seals described are naturally those with inscriptions. No. 1, a fine specimen of the first period (or, according to MM. Menant and de Clercq, of the Agadé school of engraving) represents in two incidents a struggle between a lion and a bull. It is inscribed, apparently, with the owner's name, Amel-ili, with which Mr. Pinches compares the Biblical Methusael (Mutu sa ili, "Man of God"). The subject of No. 4, which is of the second period (M. Menant's school of Ur), is devotional. Three figures appear to be engaged in the worship of a central female goddess, and the inscription reads: Anu-iddin apil Islan-si arad Nin-si-ana, "Anu-iddin, son of Islan-si, servant of the deity Nin-si-ana," that is, of Ishtar as the planet Venus. No. 10 is important not so much for the subject represented as for the owner's name, "Mattatum," daughter of Ahuni, servant of the goddess Ninak (?).

The form "Mattatum" must be referred to the comparatively rare root natānu, "to give," and Mr. Pinches finds in this inscription a confirmation of his theory that the root natānu was introduced by the trading population of Babylonia. "There is hardly a doubt that Mattatum and her father Ahuni were, like Bin-Addu-natan in the time of Nabonidus, of foreign (western) origin." No. 16, of Babylonian workmanship, bears the inscription frequently met with on cylinders of this class, Martu dumu Ana, "Martu, son of Anu," a god otherwise known as "the Rimmon of storms." The catalogue is furnished with serviceable reproductions of all the objects described; and on this account, as well as owing to the fulness and minuteness of the explanatory matter, it would be of great assistance to a beginner in the study of this important and fascinating department of ancient art. Mr. Pinches has also prepared a catalogue of the Babylonian tablets in the same possession. They are twelve in number, and, with the exception of one belonging to the reign of Samsu-satana, range in point of date from the period of Nabopolassar to that of Darius. The texts are translated in full; and it is to be hoped that Mr. Pinches will find time to publish the more important of the originals, which are mostly contracts—a class of documents which, to judge from the vast accumulation of transcripts, seems to possess more attractions for the copyist than for the translator.

Die Sprache der Contracte Nabu-naids. By K. L. Tallqvist. (Helsingfors: Frenckell & Son.) The publication by Dr. Strassmaier of many hundreds of the clay contract-tablets which have been discovered under the soil of Babylonia has opened up a new mine of information as regards the social life of the ancient population in the valley of the Euphrates. Dr. Oppert has been the first to work at it; and to his indefatigable labours, followed by those of Dr. Peiser, we owe an unexpected knowledge of ancient Babylonian law. Mr. Tallqvist's publication deals not with the matter but with the language of such of the tablets as belong to the reign of Nabonidus, the last king of Babylon, and partly also to the reigns of Nebuchadnezzar and Cyrus. It will be found on this account of the highest value to all who wish to translate and interpret these ancient documents. The tablets are first of all classified according to their contents; next the phonetic and grammatical peculiarities of their language are given in detail; and, finally, a very full and useful vocabulary is added, with references to the passages in which each word is found. We have observed but few omissions in the latter, among which, however, may be specified tannurriqatu—"empty casks."

Jurisprudentiæ Babylonicae quæ supersunt. By F. E. Peiser. (Cöthen: Schettler's Sons.) This is a fitting appendix to Mr. Tallqvist's work, and will be found exceedingly interesting by students of law. Dr. Peiser illustrates a number of early Babylonian statutes by cases which occurred in later times and are recorded among the tablets published by Dr. Strassmaier. A considerable number of the statutes he quotes refer to the dowry of the wife and the right of inheritance to it. The Babylonian woman enjoyed a considerable amount of independence, and after marriage the husband was unable to touch either the dowry or the other property which belonged to the wife. She could deal with them pretty much as she wished. We even find her property secured against the claims of the creditors of her father-in-law. Other statutes illustrated by Dr. Peiser relate to the purchase of property through an agent, and demonstrate the highly complex and commercial character of Babylonian society.

SCIENCE NOTES.

HER MAJESTY has been graciously pleased to command that the government institution now known as the Normal School of Science and Royal School of Mines shall in future be called the Royal College of Science, London.

THE first meeting of the session of the Linnean Society will be held on Thursday next, November 6, when the Rev. Prof. Henslow will read a paper entitled "A Contribution to the Study of the Relative Effects of different parts of the Solar Spectrum on the Assimilation of Plants."

THE Geologists' Association will hold a conversazione on Friday next, November 7, in the library of University College, Gower-street, when a large number of mineral and fossil specimens, microscopic appliances, and photographs will be exhibited.

THE botanical library and herbarium of the late John Ball, traveller in Morocco and elsewhere, have been presented to the Royal Botanical Gardens at Edinburgh, after certain selections had been taken from them for Kew.

PHILOLOGY NOTES.

A REPORT on the Orientalist Congress, held in Sweden in 1889, by H. H. Dhruva, the delegate of the Gaikwad of Baroda, gives some curious statistics. According to him, there were present 459 European, 16 American, 13 Asiatic, and 5 African scholars. He assigns 380 to the Teutoni-Gothic (sic) race, 37 to the Graeco-Latin, 19 to the Slavonic, and 44 to mixed races. According to religion, 2 were Brahmanic, 2 Buddhist, 1 Zoroastrian, 9 Mohammedan, the rest Christian. Were there no Jews? He sates that 106 papers were contributed by 86 members. Of these 48 were in French, 37 in German, 18 in English, 2 in Italian. This does not seem to bear out the preponderance of the German element at the last Congress, of which we have heard so much.

PART V. of Epigraphia Indica, the record of the Archaeological Survey of India (London: Kegan Paul & Co.), has but recently been received in this country, though it bears date October, 1889. Like the preceding parts, it is devoted entirely to inscriptions; and it contains an exceptionally large number of facsimiles. These, it is worthy of note, have all been produced in England, by Mr. William Griggs's process of photo-lithography—one of them from a drawing by Mr. J. S. Kipling, the father of the clever young story-teller. No less than four out of six inscriptions are edited by Prof. G. Bühler, of Vienna, the other two being due to Prof. Kielhorn, of Göttingen, and Dr. Hultzsch, of Madras. Most of them have been previously edited, from imperfect copies; but the main object of the present publication is to place authentic texts at the disposal of scholars. On more than one occasion, Prof. Bühler's comments are of general historical interest. In discussing a prāsasti or eulogy, engraved on a stone slab at Udepur, in Gwalior, which gives a genealogy of the Rajput kings of Malwa from the ninth to the eleventh century, with a catalogue of their exploits, he examines how far the statements agree with those preserved in written chronicles. Concerning two peoples against whom these kings made war, the Hunas and the Turushkas, he points out that the former may represent the non-Aryan or Scythian element in the modern Rajput, and that the latter may be identical with the first Muhammadan invasion under Mahmud of Ghazni. So again, with regard to a much earlier inscription, that of the Buddhist Toramana Shaha from the Salt Range in the Punjab (of the fourth or fifth century), he quotes approvingly a suggestion of Prof. Karabacek that the name Toramana may be derived from the Turkish for "rebel." The last inscription here edited has a special interest as being now preserved at Cintra, in Portugal, and as having been most ingeniously restored by the late Dr. Bhagvanlal Indraji.

APART from Epigraphia Indica, the inscriptions of Southern India are being edited in an independent series of the publications of the Archaeological Survey by Dr. E. Hultzsch, epigraphist to the Madras Government. The first volume, which has recently been published at Madras (London: Kegan Paul & Co.), contains a large number of inscriptions in Sanskrit and Tamil, chiefly from the well-known sites of The Seven Pagodas (Māmallapuram) and Conjeveram (Kāñchipuram). A second volume, containing the inscriptions of the great temple of Tanjore, is stated to be nearly ready for the press. In the preface, Dr. Hultzsch acknowledges his obligations, so far as the Tamil inscriptions are concerned, to a Tamil Brahmin, Mr. V. Venkayya, who has been trained in the methods of western accuracy. The method of publication adopted is the same as in Epigraphia Indica, except that there are no facsimile plates. The editor's object has been—first, to give an absolutely faithful transcript of each inscription, based, wherever possible, upon a mechanical reproduction, such as a squeeze; and, second, to extract all the historical facts, by means of comparison with other similar records. The oldest inscriptions are those of the Pallava kings, from the fifth to the eleventh century A.D. Of the next dynasty, that of the Eastern Chalukya, Dr. Hultzsch prints a more detailed pedigree than has appeared elsewhere, covering a period of nearly six hundred years. He also claims to have fixed the date of three Chola kings, hitherto uncertain. In connexion with a pedigree of the first dynasty of Vijayanagar, he remarks that the story of Prince Ahmed and the Peri Bannu (Burton's Supplemental Nights, vol. iii.) incorporates the description of a visit to Vijayanagar paid by a Muhammadan ambassador from Samarkand in 1443. This fixes a terminus a quo for the story, and also proves (if proof were needed) that Galland did not invent it.

MEETINGS OF SOCIETIES.

SHELLEY SOCIETY.—(Wednesday, Oct. 15.)

W. M. ROSETTI, Esq., in the chair.—Mr. H. S. Salt read a paper on "The New Shelleyism." After remarking that, if the present century has had much to say about Shelley, the next will have still more, and that there will be disappointment for those critics who deprecate "chatter about Shelley," Mr. Salt proceeded to discuss the successive phases of public opinion concerning the poet and his writings. First, there was "the abusive era," when Shelley was consistently, if wrongly, denounced as both a bad poet and a foolish thinker. Secondly, "the apologetic era," when the beauty of his poetry was fully acknowledged, but the convictions which inspired the poetry were set aside, in pity rather than in anger, as shallow and valueless. This is the conception of Shelley's character which has been prevalent for the past forty years; but, like all transitional notions, it is inconsistent and unscientific, resting on the fallacious assumption that ennobling poetry can result from a faulty ideal, and thereby making an enigma out of a character which is in truth singularly clear and intelligible. Lastly, there is the appreciative era—the "New Shelleyism"—which will honour Shelley, not on the ground that he sang beautifully on behalf of a mistaken theory, but because "seeing clearly that the current forms of religion and morals would have to be revolutionised, he expressed that conviction in words of consummate tenderness and power." Great stress was laid by the lecturer on the fact that the verdict of time, as far as it has yet been given, is in favour of Shelley's doctrines, alike in religion and sociology; and a considerable portion of the paper was devoted to illustrations of this point. Finally, he disproved, by reference to the prose writings, some of the common fallacies concerning Shelley—e.g., that he expected a sudden miraculous change in human nature; that his views are in conflict with evolutionary science; and that he regarded priests and kings as the originators of human misery. The conclusion enforced was that the coming democracy will see Shelley in his true human character, as the prophet of a larger, saner morality which will bring with it the realisation of equality and freedom. It is impossible that he can be fully and fairly appreciated by critics who are out of sympathy with his revolutionary and humanitarian aspirations.—The chairman characterised the paper as the most important yet read before the Society. The discussion was continued by Mr. Bernard Shaw, Mr. G. W. Foote, Mr. Ernest Radford, Mrs. Dryhurst, and others.

HELLENIC SOCIETY.—(Monday, October 20.)

PROF. JEBB, president, in the chair.—Mr. A. H. Smith read a paper on the sculptured drum from Ephesus, which is now in the British Museum, and is commonly interpreted as relating to the story of Alcestis. He tried to show that the subject of the relief is the making and sending forth of Pandora as told by Hesiod. According to this theory, Pandora stands, ready to depart, between Eros and Hermes, who is seen conferring on her the gift of speech. Hephaestus stands on the left of the scene. On the right a goddess, perhaps Peitho, holds out a necklace, and beyond her is a seated figure of Zeus. The writer adduced an unpublished vase in the British Museum to support his argument. Miss Harrison, Mr. Watkies Lloyd, and Mr. Cecil Smith took part in the discussion which followed. Mr. Theodore Bent gave an account of his recent researches in Cilicia, and regretted that, owing to the bulk of epigraphical material, the paper on the district of Olba would not be ready for the next issue of the Hellenic Journal. He described, first of all, the coast towns of the district of Augusta Sebaste, Corycos, and a third town, Korasios, which he has identified as the Pseudo-Korasiesium of Stephanus Byzantius. He then proceeded to describe his identification of the Corycian cave by means of inscriptions; and the long list of Cilician names, 160 in all, which he found on the outer wall of the temple of Zeus over the cave. He then spoke of the adjoining cave, only alluded to by Pomponius Mela as Typhonia, and a third cave on the lip of which was a fortress with an inscription on it stating that it was built under the priest-king Teucer in honour of the Olbian Jove under the superintendence of one Pleistarchos of Olba. Mr. Bent gave an account of several cave temples of Hermes which he found in this district, associating them with the deity of the Cilician pirates, and Corycos, which Oppian calls the city of Hermes. Mr. Bent then described his explorations of the gorge of the Lamas River, with its numerous rock-fortresses, each with its own particular symbol, and evidently the strongholds of the Cilician pirates. Then an account was given of the discovery of the capital of Olba itself at a spot called Oura, high in the mountains, and its identification from an inscription on the aqueduct. Mr. Bent described the great temple of Olbian Jove, where the priest-kings mentioned by Strabo held their court, and other ruins still standing in this city in the Taurus. In conclusion, Mr. Bent described his identification of the ruins of Boudroum on the Cilician plain with Hieropolis Castabala, the last place where Alexander the Great halted before the battle of Issos. Mr. Hogarth, who had recently been over part of the same ground with Prof. Ramsay, while bearing cordial testimony to the thoroughness of Mr. Bent's researches, expressed dissent from some of his conclusions. He spoke of the district in question, and especially the city of Olba, as among the most remarkable in Asia Minor. An ancient Roman road ran through the region, littered on either side with ruins of cities and villages. It was a veritable country of the dead. Sir Charles Newton also offered some remarks on details of the paper, and spoke highly of its interest and importance.

FINE ART.

Aahun, Gurob, and Hawara. By W. M. Flinders Petrie. With Chapters by F. LL. Griffith and Percy E. Newberry. (Kegan Paul & Co.)

THE publication of Mr. Petrie's record of his last year's explorations coincided this season with the opening of his exhibition at Oxford Mansion; and, although the objects which he has just had on view are the results of his work in the Fayûm during the past winter and spring, they come mainly from Kahun and Gurob, and carry on the story begun in 1889. The book, in fact, forms an admirable commentary upon the exhibition, and the exhibition practically illustrated the book. The account of the excavation of these two very important sites possesses most interest for the archaeologist and the student of Egyptian history; but for the general reader, Mr. Petrie's vivid description of the opening of the pyramid of Amenemhat III. at Hawara, with all its perils and "hair-breadth" escapes, will have the never-failing charm that belongs to a narrative of personal adventure.

This tremendous task, it will be remembered, was begun by Mr. Petrie in January 1888; and, after tunnelling his way to the heart of the mass, he had just reached the stone roof of the sepulchral chamber when he was compelled by the overwhelming heat of the Egyptian summer to defer the completion of his work till the following season. As the stone-casing is all destroyed, and the bulk of the pyramid consists entirely of sun-dried bricks bedded in loose sand, it might be supposed that the work of tunnelling would be comparatively easy; but the matter proved to be neither simple nor even devoid of peril. The bricks, in the first place, weighed from forty to fifty pounds each; and, as the removal of one necessarily loosened some two or three others, the sand running out all the while from between the joints like sand in an hour-glass, it follows that the utmost precaution had to be used in boarding up the roof of the passage. This delicate and dangerous task was performed by Mr. Petrie himself, step by step, after the rate of five feet per diem, from February 11, 1888 to the 5th of the following April.

"As the tunnel advanced to the middle," writes Mr. Petrie, "I found that the rock had dipped down far below the outside level on which we had begun; and the floor therefore had to be cut lower, until the tunnel was so high that I had a false roof above the working roof to support the bricks. Occasionally falls of the side took place, and the false roof above broke away in parts, and hung in other places as if a touch would bring it down. The lower roof, however, sustained what actually fell; but the whole region was caving slowly in, and even the lower roof was only supported on a fissured mass which stuck somehow on to the side of the tunnel. In the second season the state of matters was still more dangerous; falls of the sides and roof continually took place, even three times in twenty-four hours. As masons from Cairo were working inside, it was needful to clear away all signs of the falls, and re-strut the sides, as quickly as possible; and as happily nothing much fell while they were inside, they never knew anything about the state of affairs. One of these falls would bring down tons of bricks from the sides and roof, along perhaps twenty feet in length. I then at once began clearing the stuff out with some lads, needing to pass all along the unsupported and loose tunnel to get it clear; and then turning everyone out—sometimes at night—I used to re-prop the sides without any interference. The need of listening acutely all the time to detect any sand running down—the prelude to a fall—and the need of having the narrow way quite clear to retreat in half a second if needs be, made it necessary to work quite alone" (p. 6).

When, after all this labour, the sepulchral chamber was at last discovered, it was found to consist of one gigantic hollowed-out block of sandstone, weighing about a hundred and ten tons, roofed by three enormous slabs of the same material. Above this was an upper chamber roofed in by longitudinal beams, supporting a third roof of pent-house form, which consisted of huge slanting beams of limestone, three deep, and weighing about fifty-five tons each. No other way being practicable, Mr. Petrie engaged masons from Cairo to attack the stone roofing, and, after twenty-one days of steady work, an opening was at last forced into the upper chamber. Here, in the floor, the opening to the entrance-passage was found; and Mr. Petrie may be envied the sensation of triumph which he must have felt when, after clearing away some of the mud and stones which choked the downward way, he beheld the hollow chamber and the sarcophagi within. That the true entrance had been found as far back certainly as the time of Roman rule in Egypt, that the king's sarcophagus had been opened, and that the funerary treasures of Amenemhat III. had disappeared, was no more than Mr. Petrie expected; but he must have been disappointed to find the walls of the chamber, unlike those of the pyramids of Teta, Unas, and Pepi, absolutely blank. Had not some fragments of alabaster vases inscribed with the cartouches of Amenemhat III. been found at the bottom of the water and mud with which the monolithic chamber was flooded, the fact that this pyramid had once contained the mummy of the builder of the Labyrinth could never have been proven.

But there is a second sarcophagus in this chamber, which has been very curiously contrived by the insertion of a head and a foot slab between the large sarcophagus and the east wall. Although this also was empty, there can be no doubt that it was made for a daughter of Amenemhat III., named Neferu-Ptah, whose magnificent table of offerings in sculptured alabaster, together with the fragments of eight or nine alabaster bowls, all inscribed for the "royal daughter Neferu-Ptah," were discovered in the "well-chamber" to the north of the sepulchral chamber. As Mr. Petrie points out, the making of this second sarcophagus was clearly an afterthought. It must have been put together after the pyramid was built, when no larger blocks could be brought in; yet before the final closing of the structure, which could not have taken place till the king died, and was himself buried there. Neferu-Ptah must, therefore, have pre-deceased her father. The king's sarcophagus must also, of course, have been carried up from without, and placed in position before the roof of the chamber was laid on, there being no passage in this pyramid through which it could have been conveyed. How the huge monolithic chamber itself can have been lifted and lowered into the excavated rock in which it stands, and which forms the core of the pyramid, is one of those problems of ancient Egyptian engineering which no wall-paintings or papyri have yet enabled us to solve.

In pl. v., at the end of the book, Mr. Petrie gives a remarkably accurate and elegant outline-drawing to scale of the before-named table of offerings, which consists of a rectangular oblong slab in fine alabaster, measuring twenty-six and a-half inches in length by seventeen in breadth and nine in depth, sculptured in low relief with some one hundred and fifty representations of food and drink offerings, such as cakes, lumps of meat, ducks, geese, vegetables, eggs, various kinds of wine, and the like, the whole surrounded by an exquisitely cut dedication in hieroglyphic characters. Altars in stone or clay thus provided with imperishable offerings are by no means uncommon;* but this one is not only peculiar in the omission of the calves' heads and gazelle haunches, which almost invariably form part of the funerary bill of fare; but it is absolutely unique in the singular treatment of certain of the hieroglyphs with which it is inscribed. All the birds which occur as alphabetic forms, or as ideographs, are represented without legs—a kind of abridgment of which I believe no other example is known. More curious still, it would appear that the scribe who engraved the name and titles of this hitherto unknown princess on her libation bowls had cut the bird-forms, wherever they occurred, in the usual manner, but had afterwards systematically erased the legs. This, as Mr. Petrie observes, shows that the omission of the legs in the altar inscription was not a mere device to save space or labour, but that it embodied some "mystical idea" to which we have no clue.

Mr. Petrie's discoveries last year at Tell Kahun and Tell Gurob, where he found the undisturbed ruins of two towns, one of the XIIth and the other of the XVIIIth and XIXth Dynasties, were so fully described at time in the ACADEMY, and were so amply illustrated by the rich store of objects from both sites which he exhibited last autumn at Oxford Mansion, that recapitulation here is unnecessary. The large plan of Kahun (XIIth Dynasty) which was pinned to the door of the Kahun room, is reproduced in pl. xv. of the present volume; and it is most interesting to turn from this plan to Mr. Petrie's admirable chapter on "The Civilisation of the XIIth Dynasty," and there to read exactly how the town was built, and what objects were found in the houses. These objects, again, are figured with Mr. Petrie's accustomed fidelity in pls. viii. to xvii. Here we once more see those curious dishes with rough incised patterns; those wooden hoes, and rakes, and grain-scoops; that curious brick-maker's mould; those plasterer's floats and carpenter's tools; and, most interesting of all, that primitive wooden sickle set with flint saws, which were of such absorbing interest in Mr. Petrie's exhibition of 1889. Here, too, are reproduced the ivory castanets and the painted canvas mask from the House of the Dancer, together with the grotesque little wooden figure of that long-departed ballerina, whose last pas must have been executed about the time when Abraham went down into the land of Egypt. No less interesting are Mr. Petrie's outline-plates (pl. xvi. and pl. xvii.) of flint and bronze tools, and (pl. xii. and pl. xiii.) of the numerous forms of cups, jars, pots, ring-stands, bowls, and other domestic vessels in pottery of that remote period. That so large a number of objects, many of them at that time of considerable value, should have been left in the houses when the town was deserted is very strange, and would seem to point to some sudden panic. The women, for instance, left not only their whorls and their spindles, of which a large number were found, but also a store of dyed wool, not yet spun; the net-makers left their netting-needles, their netting, and the balls of twine which were not yet made up; the weaver left his beam and the flat sticks with which he beat up his weft; and in the shop of a metal-caster were found, not only a fine bronze hatchet ready for sale, but his whole stock-in-trade in the shape of moulds for casting chisels, knives, and hatchets. Bronze mirrors, toilet objects, children's toys, draught-boxes, amulets, scarabaei, beads, rush-mats, baskets, brushes, and sandals, handbags made to draw with a cord, spoons, combs, and other personal possessions of these people who lived and died some four to five thousand years ago, were also found in their houses. Had all these things been buried in tombs with the mummies of their former owners, it would not have been surprising; but that agricultural labourers, craftsmen, and well-to-do persons in a superior rank of life should have left so many valuables in their houses is most significant, especially as no cemetery of that period was found in the place.

The most surprising, and perhaps destined to be the most important, part of Mr. Petrie's work as recorded in this volume is contained in his chapter on "The Foreigners," wherein he gives an exhaustive and scrupulously minute account of the relics of that fair-haired and fair-skinned race which appears to have inhabited for about a hundred years the ancient town represented by Tell Gurob. The name of this town is lost; but there is evidence to show that it was founded during the reign of Thothmes III. (XVIIIth Dynasty), and that it was practically abandoned about the time of Seti II. (XIXth Dynasty). The strangers would seem to have been colonists from Asia Minor, or possibly from the islands of the Aegean, as shown by the shapes, patterns, and glazes of their pottery; by the weights they had in use; by their un-Egyptian habits, their names, and the strange alphabetic signs scratched upon their potsherds. These signs, as well as an equally remarkable series of signs from the potsherds of Kahun, are reproduced in facsimile by Mr. Petrie in pls. xxvii. and xxviii., the originals being now in the British Museum. That they do actually comprise a large number of Phoenician and Cypriote characters, and of those very archaic forms commonly known as Cadmaean Greek, besides others which are identical with a large proportion of those of the Etruscan alphabet, is undeniable. The questions raised by this discovery are far too wide and too complicated to be settled off-hand, and the answers which they may eventually evoke cannot yet be foreseen; but no one who dispassionately weighs the mass of circumstantial evidence which Mr. Petrie places before us in this chapter can fail to see that we are on the eve of a most important revelation touching the pre-Homeric history of the Greeks.

For the exciting story of the finding of the mummy of Horuta, a high-priest of Neith, who was buried at Hawara in the time of the XXVIth Dynasty, and whose body was literally covered from head to foot with plates of gold, and costly amulets in gold, both solid and inlaid, of the finest and most exquisite workmanship, I must refer readers of the ACADEMY to Mr. Petrie's second chapter, which reads like a story from The Thousand and One Nights.

A large number of papyri, some fragmentary, some perfect, were found by Mr. Petrie in 1889, in the ruins of Kahun and Gurob, those in the former town being especially valuable, as but very few XIIth Dynasty papyri were heretofore known. Three of the most perfect of these earlier documents have been translated by Mr. F. Ll. Griffith (chap. vi.), namely: (1) a settlement, or will, made by a sub-priest of Sopt, named Uah, in which he devises certain of his property to his wife absolutely, including three Syrian servants, probably slaves; and whereby he especially provides that he shall be buried in the same tomb with his wife, and that no other person shall be laid there with them. (2) The will of a man named Keba, confirming the settlement which he made upon Teta his wife, bequeathing his house to certain of his children, and relinquishing his priestly office in favour of his son, named Iu-Senb, saying—"I am growing old now that I have become aged in it. Let him enter upon it immediately." (3) A letter addressed to a nobleman named Ta-ab, by a man named Ana, in which, with a profusion of compliments, he congratulates Ta-ab on the acquisition of a house on which he had "placed his desire." Autotype reproductions of those very ancient documents would have made a valuable addition to Mr. Petrie's plates.

Chap. vii., which concludes this volume, is written by Mr. Percy E. Newberry, and treats in a most interesting manner of the various flowers, fruits, seeds, vegetables, &c., found at Hawara and Kahun. A number of peas and beans, fragments of the leaves and stems of the cucumber, and two small radishes, were found in the ruins of the houses of Kahun, and are among the oldest vegetable remains which have yet been discovered in Egypt. The fruit trees which, from the abundance of their stones, appear to have been commonest, namely, the heglig and the dellach palm, are now no longer found in Egypt, the former being confined to Abyssinia, and the latter to Nubia. So also with the mimusops Schimperi, of which both the fruit and leaves have been found at Kahun, and which now only occurs in Central Africa and in Abyssinia. Mr. Newberry suggests that this last may, perhaps, be the persea tree of the ancients, which we find so often represented in Egyptian wall-paintings and bas-reliefs, but which has never yet been satisfactorily identified.

Kahun, Gurob, and Hawara is uniform with Mr. Petrie's preceding volumes; that is to say, the print and paper are alike excellent, and the plates (twenty-eight in number) are, as usual, admirably drawn and full of interest. One could have wished for photographs of the jewels of Horuta, and of one of his surpassingly beautiful funerary statuettes; also, views of Kahun and Gurob, and the pyramid of Hawara, would have been most acceptable. But, where so much has been given, and at so moderate a cost, it is, perhaps, ungrateful to ask for more.

NOTES ON ART AND ARCHAEOLOGY.

THE exhibitions to open next week are exceptionally numerous. First, there are the annual exhibitions of the Institute of Painters in Oil Colours, in Piccadilly, and of the Royal Society of British Artists, in Suffolk-street. Then, Messrs. Dowdeswell have two collections in New Bond-street—"Mountain, Meadow, Moss, and Moor," by Mr. J. Denovan Adam; and pastels illustrative of Hampstead Heath, by Mr. Henry Muhrman. Last, but not least, we may mention a series of "Wild Animals studied from the Life," done in pastel by Mr. J. T. Nettle-ship, which Mr. Robert Dunthorne will have on view in Vigo-street.

THE third annual congress of the National Association for the Advancement of Art and its Application to Industry opens at Birmingham on Tuesday next, and lasts through the remainder of the week. The inaugural address of the president, Mr. J. E. Hodgson, will be delivered on the evening of Tuesday. Among those who have promised to read papers are Mr. John Brett, Mr. W. B. Richmond, Mr. Alfred Gilbert, and Mr. E. Onslow Ford, all associates of the Royal Academy; while lectures will be delivered to working-men on "Metal-Work" by Mr. Starkie Gardner, on "Glass" by Mr. Henry Holiday, and on "Art-Books and how to read them" by the president.

THE Society for the Preservation of the Monuments of Ancient Egypt has drawn up a memorial to the Marquis of Salisbury, which is being signed by "students of history and archaeology, architects, painters, and sculptors, men of letters, and others, lovers of art," with reference to the recent disgraceful mutilation of ancient sculptures in the valley of the Nile, to which attention has been repeatedly drawn in the ACADEMY. The special prayer of the memorial is that the British representative at Cairo may be directed to press for the appointment by the Egyptian government of an English official inspector of monuments, fully qualified for the performance of his duties, who should be instructed to submit for publication annual reports of his proceedings. The hon. secretary of the society is Mr. Henry Wallis, of Buckingham-street, Adelphi, who will be glad to receive signatures to the memorial up to Monday, November 17.

ON Thursday next, November 6, Prof. A. H. Church will commence his annual course of six lectures on chemistry at the Royal Academy. The subjects that he will specially deal with are the chemistry of pigments, vehicles, and varnishes, and the conservation of paintings and drawings.

THOSE of our readers who are interested in original etching will hear with pleasure that it has been arranged that there shall almost immediately be an exhibition in New York of the etched work of Mr. William Strang. Though no one's debt to his seniors and forerunners is larger or more obvious than Mr. Strang's, it is yet true to say at the same time that he is one of the most original, because he is one of the most imaginative of living British artists. His œuvre—to use the word of the connoisseur of etching—the bulk and body of his work, so to speak, is already very considerable and very varied; and we do not doubt that those American amateurs who perceived with promptitude the qualities of Meryon, of Millet, and of Legros, will find, under the uncouth envelope, much that is of sterling value, much that is interesting and penetrating, in the etchings of Mr. Strang.

SIR COUTTS LINDSAY has made public the following statement with regard to the Grosvenor Gallery:

"I regret to say that I am no longer able to carry on the yearly exhibition of works of art in these galleries on account of the heavy loss it entails on my resources, the outlay consequent on the exhibitions being far in excess of the counterbalancing receipts. On this account the present Pastel exhibition will be the last exhibition offered to the general public in my galleries. They will now be taken over by the Grosvenor Club, which, with the circulating library, will henceforth occupy the whole of the premises. It is with deep regret that I am constrained to forego such efforts as I have been able to make in the cause of art and artists by means of these galleries during the last 12 years. I am, however, confident that the club now prospering in the Grosvenor will enable a large number of pictures, not necessarily works of the year, to pass under the eye of purchasers. It is proposed to hang these pictures on the walls of the club galleries, and they will be seen by many thousand people at the periodical receptions of the club in the course of the season, and will be for sale at the discretion of the exhibitor. These pictures will be changed from time to time, and the club intends, should the scheme take root, to give a yearly percentage on the capital they represent. This proposal forms part of a scheme for the leasing of art works which I hope to put before the public shortly."

ALONG with the bird-drawings of Mr. H. S. Marks at the Fine Art Society, there is on view a large and important etching by Mr. Macbeth-Raeburn, from Mr. Tom Lloyd's most popular and attractive drawing, which was at the watercolour exhibition about a couple of years ago. The drawing, which, like so much of modern work, derives something of its character from the combined influences of George Mason and Frederick Walker, is at once a masculine and engaging presentation of a phase of English rural life. A group of peasants, eminently comely, yet not idealised beyond its permitted limit, waits on the further bank of a lowland river till the ferry boat shall fetch them to the nearer side. Mr. Macbeth-Raeburn has interpreted the landscape, and the group of picturesque and charming people, with a great deal of happiness. The illumination of the composition, in his plate, is possibly not quite so notably successful; but on the whole the execution of the subject is greatly to the credit of this young and rising artist.

AT a recent meeting of the Académie des Inscriptions, M. Edmond Le Blant read a paper upon "Three Famous Statues hidden by the Ancients." These were (1) the Venus of the Capitol, found within a wall in the quarter of the Suburra; (2) the Venus of Milo, found in a narrow cavern, at the corner of a rampart; and (3) the colossal Hercules in gilt bronze, called the Mastai Hercules, which occupied a hole carefully built round, at a depth of 8 metres. From a comparison of texts, M. Le Blant proved that this was not due to accident; but that the statues had been purposely buried by their worshippers, in order to save them from the iconoclastic wrath of the Christians. The believers in the old faith had a special reason to conceal their gods, because of the popular prediction that Christianity would only endure for a period of 365 years. We know that the hiding-places were often discovered by the Christians, who either destroyed the statues or converted them to decorative uses. M. Le Blant has been chosen to read this paper at the annual public meeting of the Académie to be held on November 12.

THE STAGE.

STAGE NOTES.

THE new production at a matinée at the Shaftesbury—an affair not of the management but of the "Dramatic Production Syndicate"—was really chiefly remarkable for the excellent work done by two or three of the principal artists—Miss Alma Murray and Mr. Charles Sugden especially—under circumstances that were not precisely favourable. But a word for the play, in the first place. "Monsieur Moulon" was written by Mr. Charles Hannan, who is understood to be young, and who at the present time, like many an older dramatist, has seemingly more sympathy with the methods of the pure playwright than of the artist in literature. To speak roundly, "Monsieur Moulon" has nothing literary about it; neither grace of comedy, nor grace of fancy; neither epigram nor poetry. But here and there in the construction—in the second act particularly, where one is creepily fearful half the time that a murder will be committed, which never actually comes about—there is evident some understanding of the requirements of melodrama; and though Mr. Hannan may perhaps never write for our theatres of comedy (they are few enough, Heaven knows!) we see no reason why he should not in due season provide well-manufactured plays for the Adelphi and Princess's. That is enough about him; and we would not for a moment under-rate the value of a capacity for melodrama. Miss Adrienne Dairolles, who is very incisive and piquante in her method, and Mr. Luigi Lablache and Mr. A. Wood lent useful aid to the inventions of the author; but, as we began by asserting, the substantial achievements of the afternoon were those of Mr. Sugden and Miss Alma Murray. Mr. Sugden is unequal. On Tuesday he was apparently doing his very best; and he was absolutely powerful as well as absolutely repulsive in the part of a French fisher-boy, who develops into a French tavern-keeper of the worst sort; but in whom from the very first there is refreshingly displayed a personage who, though he belongs to the "working-classes," is not virtuous, and who, though in contact with a gentleman, is yet unprovided with a grievance. Mr. Sugden was very ugly and very striking, and, as M. Zola would probably be the first to allow, very true to boot. Miss Alma Murray is praised, we see, for her "conscientiousness." With her delicate conscience there goes, we permit ourselves to add, the personal charm which is so much to an actress, and a very thorough knowledge of her art. The gradations of tenderness, strength, and intensity, more particularly in the second act, could only have been marked as they were by an artist sensitive to the possibilities of each particular moment in the piece, but, above all, viewing it as a whole.

It must suffice to record briefly the successful appearance in Paris of Mme. Sarah Bernhart as Cleopatra. The third act of that piece, which the French public owes to M. Sardou and a less-known collaborator, is not only directly derived from Shakspeare, but closely follows him. In the other acts Shakspeare is, so to speak, nowhere; but it is for those loungers of the Boulevard who inquire, unbelievably, whether in England "we really play Shakspeare much as he is," to learn that the act in M. Sardou's play which makes the greatest effect is precisely that in which the poet is least departed from. The acting of the representative of Antony was, by all accounts, remarkable, and was warmly appreciated. The scenery, dresses, and grouping were as fine as they could possibly be, many of them displaying amazing research; but at bottom, of course, the main attraction was the assumption by Mme. Bernhardt of a part for which she was born, if you will, but which, at the same time, was a trying test even to her admitted genius and to the matured resources of her art. There is reason to hope that a performance so remarkable and admirable as hers has proved to be will be seen in England, possibly next year; but it is, in any case, likely that it will be seen first on the other side of the Atlantic, whither the great tragédienne is going at about the turn of the year.

FRENCH plays have begun again in London, and at the St. James's Theatre, which was probably the first of the many temporary homes which they have had in our midst. The opening performance has been the very familiar one of "Divorçons," in which Mme. Chaumont's Cyrienne is still exceedingly clever; but the actress, as time passes over her head, and as performance follows performance, would appear to be insufficiently on her guard against the error of over-emphasis. Elle s'appuie sur chaque effet. She caresses—makes much of it—can hardly, perhaps, persuade herself to leave it alone. This, of course, is a not unnatural tendency of long runs and many repetitions; but it is obvious that, to say the least, it tends to be destructive of the delicacy of art. One of the charms of French acting used to be that one got, so to put it, not definite information on the matter in hand, but a very refined hint—the "word to the wise," in fact.

LITTLE Miss Véra Beringer goes back into the schoolroom, for her absence from which her exquisite performance of the Little Lord Fauntleroy was the best justification. She will very likely take one benefit this Christmas, after which the question of her return to the stage will not be raised, we are informed, until she has grown up.

MUSIC.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

Richard Wagner's Letters to His Dresden Friends—Theodor Uhlig, Wilhelm Fischer, and Ferdinand Heine. Translated by J. S. Shedlock. (Grevel.)

WAGNER was indeed fortunate in his friends: they were few in number, but they served him with ardent zeal and devotion. Franz Liszt stands out from among them by reason of his great fame; but Uhlig, Fischer, and Heine were also enthusiastic admirers of Wagner's genius, and as ready as Liszt to help him by all means within their power.

Theodor Uhlig was an accomplished musician, who became a member of the Dresden court orchestra before the age of twenty. This was in 1841, and in the following year "Rienzi" was produced there under Wagner's own direction. From that time down to 1849 Uhlig served under Wagner and heard his operas, but he was at first a strong opponent of the new development. However, shortly before Wagner was forced to quit Dresden, Uhlig had studied the full score of "Tannhäuser" and Wagner's "Programme" to the Choral Symphony, and he had also talked on art matters with the composer. Uhlig was thus converted to the new faith. From a bitter enemy he became a firm friend; and until his death in 1853 he devoted his time and talents to the service of the reformer. Wagner persuaded him to abandon composition, and to take up literary work. He became a contributor to the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik and other papers, and distinguished himself as a vigorous defender of Wagner and his theories.

Wilhelm Fischer, who was born about 1790, settled in Dresden in 1831, and became stage manager and chorus-master at the court theatre. In 1840 Wagner sent the full score of his "Rienzi" to Herr v. Lüttichau, the Intendant. In 1841 the opera was accepted, and forthwith Wagner wrote to Fischer from Paris thanking him for the friendly interest he had taken in him. The two men became personally acquainted in the following year, when "Rienzi" was first produced. Although Fischer was thoroughly well disposed towards Wagner, it is evident from some of the letters that there were "many points of difference" between them. In one letter Wagner refers to this:

"You love the same thing that I love. You only see it otherwise than I, because you use quite a different pair of spectacles: you want, above all things, rest; I, above all things, unrest. That you are able to love me, that saves you from the Philistine egoism into which the devil would willingly draw you, but from which your fresh, warm, true heart preserves you."

They remained firm friends down to Fischer's death in 1868.

Ferdinand Heine was a comedian engaged at the Dresden court theatre, and also a designer of the costumes. The correspondence between the two men begins in 1841, and the last letter is dated 1868. From the terms of the few letters published (twenty-six in all) we gather that Heine was a special intimate of Wagner's. "Write," he says in one letter, "just as though we were chumming together in the evening over our herring-pickle."

There is one thing which we miss in this volume, and that is the letters of the three Dresden friends to Wagner. Did he keep them, and are there private reasons for not publishing them? We are unable to say; but from the fact that not a single one is given, it is to be feared that they were not preserved. It would indeed have been gratifying to read these letters; and, at any rate, they would have thrown light upon many difficult passages in Wagner's own. In the Wagner-Liszt correspondence, the bright, kindly letters of Liszt contrasted agreeably with the despairing, and at times bitter, language of Wagner; and in the Dresden friends we should have had contrast, though perhaps of a different kind.

It would be quite impossible to give in a brief notice anything like a detailed account of the contents of these letters, which in point of interest are equal to those addressed to Liszt. In one respect they are yet more attractive. In writing to Liszt, Wagner no doubt felt that he was communicating with a true and devoted friend; but he was certainly not on the same terms of intimacy with him as with the Dresden trio. With the latter he is quite at his ease. In a letter to Uhlig, Wagner indeed expresses his surprise that Liszt, so different from him in his life and mode of thought, should take such interest in him. And from several other passages we see that he felt somewhat uncomfortable with regard to Liszt when the scheme of the "Ring des Nibelungen" dawned upon him, and forced him to withdraw from his undertaking to write an opera for Weimar.

The letters written to Uhlig from Paris in 1850 are particularly interesting. Wagner had previously been there in June, 1849. Liszt considered "Paris, for everything and before everything, a necessity to you." Wagner was to return in the winter, and to arrange with a French poet about a libretto for the Paris Opera. He went back in February, 1850, and from a few short lines to Liszt we know that he was unsuccessful. But in the present volume we learn a great deal about this unfortunate expedition. There are, first of all, several letters to Uhlig. Wagner went to see "Le Prophète"; and this "banker's music," which drew crowded houses and obtained enthusiastic applause, made him feel that he could do no good in the gay city. He had never had very much hope of success. He describes how he had worked at his "Wiland" sketch while in Zürich. He says: "it always sounded to me like comment vous portez-vous—the ink wouldn't flow, the pen scratched: without was bad, dull weather." The success of "Le Prophète" disheartened him, and he returned to Zürich determined to work for art in his own way. Heine, it appears, was in favour of the Paris scheme; and in September Wagner wrote him a long letter describing his state of "deepest distraction and melancholy."

"My stay in Paris," he says, "is one of the most villainous things that I have ever experienced. Everything which I foretold and foresaw came literally to pass. My sketch for an opera-poem appeared ridiculous, and with good reason, to everybody who knew anything of the French language and the French Opera."

Further on he speaks about being back "in my friendly, healthy Zürich, from which neither god nor devil shall drive me any more."

In the Uhlig letters Wagner touches upon a great variety of subjects. He has much to say about the famous pamphlets and writings which occupied so much of his time during the first few years of exile. One long letter (No. 55) is devoted almost entirely to Beethoven, in which Wagner maintains that the master's great works are only in the last place music, and that they are a sealed book to all who regard them merely from an "absolute" point of view. He is especially angry with conductors who for the most part consider only the "how" and not the "what." Of Mendelssohn he asserts that "his performance of Beethoven's works was always based only upon their purely musical side, and never upon their poetical contents which he could not grasp at all." That this is exaggerated language no reasonable person would deny. But to genius much must be forgiven. Wagner looked at Beethoven's music through his own spectacles, and they were spectacles of such power that he could see much in the great master's music which was hidden from others. He "enjoyed" the music the better for attempting to grasp the meaning, and for feeling that he had grasped the true meaning; but he surely went too far in trying to force—as he seems to do—his interpretations on others. The emotional feeling may, and ought to, remain the same, but the interpretation will vary according to the individual. This letter is full of thought, full of right intentions; but, after all, it does not say enough to a true musician, and too much to persons who, having no real feeling for music, are glad of any romantic or picturesque programme to excite their imagination. It will be a dangerous weapon in the hands of the advocates of programme music.

Wagner's disgust with "the state of things generally" was perhaps never more strongly expressed than when he declares that he will not waste his powers "in distressful and quite hopeless attempts to galvanise the corpse of European civilisation." Like all great men, he varied in his moods, and sometimes a very small circumstance occasioned a great change. In many letters he speaks about himself, and shows how thoroughly he was aware of his own failings. The fact is, he was human, and had his ups and downs, his ebb and flow; but with his passionate nature and intellectual gifts, the contrasts were much stronger than with common folk. Anyone reading these letters and judging Wagner from an ordinary standard will misunderstand them. They will abuse him for his violent attacks on men whom the world honours; they will accuse him of selfishness, of weakness, of heaven knows what! To be fair to Wagner, he must be judged as a whole, and he must be weighed in balances capable of discriminating genius.

Space prevents us from dwelling upon the letters to Fischer and Heine. Rut, after all, brief quotations would give a feeble idea of their contents, and perhaps only spoil the enjoyment of those who will read the volume. We may add that it contains a portrait etched by C. W. Sherborn. J. S. SHEDLOCK.

MUSIC NOTES.

MME. ESSIOFF gave the first of a series of four recitals at the Steinway Hall, on Wednesday evening, October 22. She played Beethoven's Sonata in A flat (Op. 26). There was not much fault to find with the first and second movements, but the funeral march lacked dignity, and the sensational bass in the finale was out of place. Her rendering of the Brahms Variations on a Handel theme was extremely good; but why did she omit the concluding fugue? She gave a Sicilienne by Bach with much charm and refinement. Mr. Franklin Clive, the vocalist, sang Dr. Stanford's "La belle dame sans merci" with considerable success.

M. PADEREWSKI made his début at the Popular Concerts on Saturday afternoon, and played the Sonata Appassionata. He gave an intelligent and interesting reading of the work, but it was occasionally marred by exaggerations. The Andante was the least satisfactory movement. Beethoven should not be played à la Chopin. The pianist was much applauded; and for an encore he gave the March from the "Ruins of Athens," arranged, we believe, by Rubinstein—he might have chosen something more suitable. Miss Liza Lehmann sang songs by Dr. Arne and Thomé with marked success.

BRAHM VAN DEN BERG, a young Belgian pianist, gave a recital at Princes Hall on Monday afternoon. Of late we have had too many youthful prodigies. The more talent they show, the greater cause is there for regret that they should appear in public. The newcomer has good and well-trained fingers, but there is nothing in his playing to astonish or to charm. The Beethoven Sonata in E flat (Op. 27, No. 2) was, on the whole, satisfactory; but the Bach Fantaisie Chromatique was given in a mechanical manner, and the Mendelssohn Rondo Capriccioso was decidedly tame. He also played two small pieces of his own composition.

THE PAGEANT of LIFE.

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d.
On the appearance of the latter the Daily Telegraph wrote in a two-column critique:—"A new poet has arisen among us; an indisputable poet, forcible, graceful, earnest, courageous—having something of real interest and great moment to say. His fellow-countrymen should read the poem; a few will withhold admiration from its lofty thoughts and splendid diction, which entitle the author to high rank among the 'British Bards' of the Victorian Age." "Rare gifts of mind and song. Since Byron, never has 'British Philistinism' been scouted in such bitter terms. Of undoubted power and quite exceptional merit."—Ibid. "The lyrics and ballads are particularly bright and good."—Academy. "A very remarkable book."—Universal Review. "That wonderful book, which has created so great a sensation in the literary world."—Vanity Fair. "All who read it will be forced to recognise its undoubted ability."—Literary World. "In all the ballads and love-lyrics, and throughout the whole poem, is manifested great lyrical sweetness."—Scotsman. "Mr. Barlow's book is poetry, and poetry, too, of a very high order."—Writer. "This wonderful book."—Metropolitan.

HISTORY of LANGUAGE, PRINCIPLES of the.

By Prof. H. PAUL. Edited for the use of English Readers, by Prof. H. A. STRONG, M.A. Second Edition, carefully Revised, with the addition of numerous Examples and Illustrations from the English Language, and a new Index. 8vo, pp. xlviii.—512, 10s. 6d. "There is no book of recent times which has exercised a more profound and extensive influence on the progress of the science of language. Probably every living philologist of eminence, whether belonging to the 'new school' or not, is directly or indirectly indebted to it for much valuable instruction. The translation must have been a task of extraordinary difficulty. On the whole it is surprisingly successful."—Athenaeum.

COMPARATIVE GRAMMAR of GREEK and LATIN.

Edited from the French of Prof. VICTOR HENRY, by R. T. ELLIOTT, M.A., late Scholar of Worcester College, Oxford. 7s. 6d. "A much-needed work."—Professor SAUCE. "No better book has appeared."—Class. Rev.

1. THE STUDENTS' CICERO.

Adapted from the German of Dr. J. G. MUNK, by W. Y. FAUSSETT, M.A., of Fettes College, Edinburgh. With a Frontispiece, 3s. 6d. "Mr. Faussett is already well known as one of the soundest and most distinguished representatives of the younger generation of Oxford scholars. He is equally at home in his renderings from the Latin of Cicero or the German of Dr. Munk. His notes, as we have said above, are really helpful and pointed, and the result of his labours has been entirely such as to justify the title of the volume. It is eminently the sort of book that a student will find profitable and stimulating."—Spectator.

2. THE STUDENTS' GREEK TRAGEDIANS.

Adapted from the German of Dr. J. G. MUNK, by A. W. VERRALL, Litt.D., Tutor of Trinity College, Cambridge. With a Frontispiece. 3s. 6d. [Shortly.]

"This book has great merits. It is the result of wide and careful reading, marked by insight and by power of selection. He has firmly seized the distinguishing characteristics of life and thought in modern Europe."—Pull Mall Gazette. "For courageous and conscientious history the writer is qualified to continue the negotiations of the late Mr. Buckle."—St. James's Gazette. "A very mine of knowledge."—Literary World.

"The only impartial history of Ireland."

14. HASSENCAUP'S HISTORY of IRELAND. 360 pp.

"The author of this work has acquitted himself admirably. His book is a scholarly work. It betrays a close acquaintance with the highest authorities on the various periods, and is as generally reliable as a history can reasonably be."—Notion. "There is throughout the work evidence of assiduous labour and conscientious anxiety to present correct views."—Athenaeum. "A comprehensive and trustworthy history."—Scotsman.

THE CRITICAL PHILOSOPHY OF KANT.

By EDWARD CAIRD, LL.D.,

Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Glasgow, late Fellow and Tutor of Merton College, Oxford.

"It is quite the most comprehensive and maturely considered contribution that has been made by an English writer to the understanding of Kant's whole philosophical achievement. It is in every way a thorough and masterly performance."—Mind.

"At last we have in English a critical exposition of 'The Critical Philosophy of Kant' which for thoroughness and ability can hold up its head before any similar attempt in other languages."—Academy.

"The object of this book is to give a connected view of the Critical Philosophy, showing the relations of the three 'Critiques' to each other, and to the other works of Kant which may be regarded as illustrations or developments of his main arguments. The first part, on the 'Critique of Pure Reason,' deals with the same subject as my former work, entitled 'The Philosophy of Kant,' but, except in a few passages it is not a reproduction of it."—Extract from PREFACE.

CYCLOPEDIA of MUSIC and MUSICIANS.

Edited by JOHN DENISON CHAMPLIN, Jun., Critical Editor, WILLIAM F. APPOINTMENT, with more than 1,000 illustrations, 3 vols., large 4to, decorated parchment binding, uniform with "Cyclopedia of Painters and Paintings." This edition is limited to 50 numbered copies for England, and these are nearly all taken up. Cash price to Subscribers, £15 15s. [New York, 1889-90.]

*The extraordinary success of the "Cyclopedia of Painters and Paintings," published by Charles Scribner's Sons, gives the publishers confidence that this similar work on Music and Musicians will occupy as high a place in the literature of its art as its preceding publication does in its field. Like that work, concurrently with which the present enterprise was undertaken, it found its claim to such a place upon three things: the character and comprehensiveness of the information which, through its text and illustrations, it for the first time makes accessible; the new simplicity of its arrangement; and the bibliography of a kind hitherto unattempted, through which it furnishes a key and guide to the whole literature of music.

BERNARD QUARITCH, 15, Piccadilly, London.

A GRAND MONUMENTAL WORK.

CYCLOPEDIA of PAINTERS and PAINTINGS.

Edited by JOHN DENISON CHAMPLIN, Jun., Critical Editor, CHARLES C. PERRINS, Corresponding Member of the French Institute, 4 vols., 4to, with more than 2,000 illustrations; a full Biographical Dictionary of the Painters of all times and schools, half-bound morocco, £5 5s. [New York, 1888.]

*This Grand Book is a Cyclopedia of the Great Pictures of the World, containing special articles on all famous paintings under their own names; it is a guide to the entire literature of the art through its lists of authorities upon each topic, and has a superb collection of illustrations of its subject.

BERNARD QUARITCH, 15, Piccadilly, London.

Large-paper Edition, on Whatman's hand-made paper, bound in vellum, with design in gold by Mr. Selwyn Image, 60 copies only (numbered), fcap. 4to, 21s. net.

"As regards Mary herself the play is finely impartial. It well represents the woman from whom.....might have come the great desire, d'être célèbre et d'être aimé, the woman whose constant boast it was—my heart is great."—Academy.

"She fails to charm; there is not a flash of gaiety in all her speeches; here is a sickly sensuousness, a dyspeptic love, a frail and fitful ambition."—Scots Observer.

"The strangely complex character of Mary, passionate, generous, full of all queenly and feminine charm, is disclosed by many a delicate and subtle touch."—Scottish Leader.

"Vigour of presentment, and a glow of colour more dazzling than delicate, are.....to be found in this picture of Mary Stuart."—Spectator.

LITERATURE.

Landmarks of Homeric Study. By the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone. (Macmillan.)

THIS book, which may probably be regarded as Mr. Gladstone's final pronouncement on the Homeric question, is in some respects an advance upon his earlier works. Thus he has recognised, more fully than before, the extent to which the Greek culture and religion were obtained, through Phœnician channels, from Babylonian sources; though he has not entirely freed himself from some of the old fantastic notions, such as the connexion between the Homeric mythology and that of Egypt and the Messianic office of Apollo in the Iliad.

Mr. Gladstone still declines to accept, or even to discuss, the results of the new school of Homeric criticism. He ignores modern opinions as to the formation of the Greek Epos, and regards both the Iliad and the Odyssey as great original works by the same writer, not based on the lays of earlier minstrels, and free from interpolations or additions of later date. He does not recognise a composite structure in the Iliad or any notes of later culture in the Odyssey. He does not seem to have any adequate consciousness of the profound chasm in the continuity of Greek life which was effected by the Dorian conquest, and the consequent destruction of the older culture by the barbarian invaders, from before whom the civilised inhabitants of Greece fled to new abodes across the sea. The memories of migration and Asiatic conquest would survive in the legendary lays sung by bards at the courts of princes who ruled in Lesbos, Cymè, and Miletus, and who claimed descent from the ancient dynasties which had reigned at Tiryns and Mycenæ. It is believed that the evolution of the Greek epos was analogous to that of the Arthurian romance, which was based on the dying struggles of the Celto-Roman civilisation, preserved by fugitives in Brittany, and finally redacted, in the pages of Wace and Geoffrey of Monmouth, at a period when the savagery of the Teutonic invaders had given place to a new civilisation, permeated with the ideas of crusading chivalry.

Instead of interpreting the Homeric epos by those principles of unconscious evolution and gradual development which produced the Carolingian and Arthurian cycles of romance, Mr. Gladstone makes Homer a far-sighted patriotic statesman, absorbed in his "beloved country," impregnated with modern race-theories, and entertaining Bismarckian designs of "launching into the world" the idea of Pan-Hellenic nationality. Not only this, but at the same time he represents Homer as a profound constructive theologian like Calvin, framing for his countrymen a national religion, with the object of binding them together into political unity, and instilling the idea of a common Hellenic nationality. Hence the chapters on "Homer as a nation-maker" and "Homer as a religion-maker" are a tissue of anachronisms. Mr. Gladstone reads into Homer the ideas and projects of the nineteenth century, attributing to him the deliberate design of founding a Pan-Hellenic nationality and a Pan-Hellenic religion. He tells us that "the diversity of the religious traditions constituted the greatest obstacle" to the conception of Hellenic nationality, and therefore Homer "elaborately constructed" an Olympian system on principles "eminently original." The result is that in the Homeric Zeus "we have an assemblage of characters not always the most homogeneous." "Homer was acquainted with Egyptian and Phœnician ideas," with the old "nature cult," and the sources of the Hebrew traditions. Hence Mr. Gladstone obtains his Homeric trinity, with the Logos and the "Messianic idea," Zeus being "the residuary legatee of the old monotheism," endued with "cynical selfishness and lust," and "a great dislike to be disturbed or bored." This, however, is consistent with a lofty conception of the "supremacy of Deity" and of "its illuminating intelligence." Such is what Mr. Gladstone calls "the subtle and refined conception wrought out by Homer." Truly, the "eminent originality" of Homer in combining incongruous ideas is only surpassed by the still more eminent originality of his latest expounder. A less ingenious critic would have seen in this "assemblage of characters not always the most homogeneous" evidence, not of the genius of Homer, but of successive stages in the long process of the development of Greek religion. Coming to the second person of his Homeric trinity, Mr. Gladstone admits that the sun-god Apollo was brought from the east, and must be identified with the Baal Merodach of Babylon. At the same time, Apollo also holds the "great saving office," and represents one phase of the Messianic idea, which must have been obtained from the old Hebrew tradition. The hawk, however, which was sacred to him, was obtained from the hawk-headed Horus of Egypt, Homer having changed the Egyptian symbols of animal life into more "purely poetical relations." In like manner the ox-eyed Herè, "in whom we have the Hellenised form of the earth-tradition," and whose dominant idea "is the Achæan nationality," derives her eyes from the "repulsive emblem" of the cow's head worn by the Egyptian Hathor. These "religious adjustments," we are informed, exhibit "the high art of the poet."

In the chapter on "The Homeric Question," Mr. Gladstone contends that the Iliad was all composed at one period, that no earlier lays were incorporated, that there were no subsequent additions, and that the Odyssey was the work of the author of the Iliad. He affirms that "it is impossible to take five or ten lines from any part of the poems which could possibly be ascribed to anyone except Homer; this observation embraces both the poems." He argues that even the Catalogue of Ships is of Homeric date and authorship, on the ground that it must have been composed before the art of writing was known to the Greeks. He does not answer, or even notice, the argument of Niese, who contends that, from the precedence given to Boeotia, and the minuteness with which Boeotri is treated, the Catalogue must be of Boeotian origin, and of late date, having apparently been compiled and inserted in the Iliad after the foundation of Cyrene in 631 B.C., and after the foundation of Lampsacus in 651, a period when the art of writing had long been practised. The older Iliad is Achæan and pre-Dorian; whereas in the Catalogue princes of Dorian colonies are made to take part in the war, while the representation of Heracles as heir to the throne of Mycenæ is plainly later than the Dorian conquest, and the expulsion of the older dynasty.

Such notes of linguistic evolution as are shown by the use of the older and later forms of the genitive, which could not have been contemporaneously used in the same place, and Bentley's discovery that certain portions of the epos were composed before and others after the disuse of the digamma, are dismissed by Mr. Gladstone as questions to be left "to students who have special qualifications," which, he modestly confesses, he does "not possess."

Nevertheless, he argues at considerable length in favour of the unity of date and the unity of authorship of the two poems. Many of his arguments merely prove that both poems belong to an archaic period. It is true that in both poems good repute is valued, rulers exercise hospitality, the person is not indecently exposed, horses are not assigned to the sun, and proper names are constructed after the same fashion; but these are merely notes of an archaism which is not disputed, and do not establish any necessary unity of authorship. It may be conceded that they tend to show that large portions of both the Iliad and the Odyssey existed essentially in their present form before the first Olympiad, but that is about all.

Another note of unity on which Mr. Gladstone relies is the close correspondence in the conception of character. But the only prominent character common to the two poems is Ulysses; and while in the Iliad he is a wise and sagacious prince, in the Odyssey he is sometimes quixotic in the extreme. Witness his conduct in the cave of Polyphemus. He is more foolish than his followers, and persists in taunting and irritating the giant while they vainly urge him to desist.

Mr. Gladstone also considers it almost impossible that two such master-poets should have arisen nearly at the same time. There was, he says, only one Shakspeare, therefore there could have been only one Homer. But he forgets that many of the Shaksperian plays are composite. Some of the finest things in these plays are found in earlier plays, which Shakspeare merely remodelled, while some of the basest things are his own. It is too late to contend that Greene, and Peele and Marlowe, had no part in "Henry VI." and "Henry VIII.," and that these plays are as purely Shaksperian as "Hamlet," "Othello," and "The Tempest." What we call "Shakspeare" is almost as composite as what we call "Homer."

Where we find in the Iliad and the Odyssey unmistakable differences in the stage of mythological evolution, in geographical knowledge, or in the development of culture, Mr. Gladstone contends that these differences are themselves only evidences of unity, showing the adaptive genius of the poet in conforming his mythology and his ethnology to the mythological and ethnical conceptions appropriate to what he calls the two zones of action; the mythology of the inner geographical zone of the Iliad being that suited to the Hellenic idea, and the mythology of the outer zone of the Odyssey being that appropriate to the Eastern or Phœnician idea—the two ideas which we are told it was Homer's chief object to fuse into a single national religion.

It has been well observed that in the Iliad the men are nobler and better than the gods, while in the Odyssey the gods have the higher moral status. In the Iliad the gods deceive men for their own purposes; in the Odyssey they are the avengers of crime, and interfere with human affairs, not from spite, favouritism, or mere caprice, but only for some high moral purpose. In the Iliad Zeus exhibits what Mr. Gladstone calls "cynical selfishness and lust"; in the Odyssey he has developed into the supreme moral ruler of the world. In the Iliad we have the turbulent Olympian court—spiteful, immoral, intriguing, brawling, and lascivious, with its petty jealousies and everlasting quarrels, and dwelling locally on the summit of Mount Olympus. In the Odyssey all this has disappeared, the gods are lofty intelligences, inhabiting the expanse of the empyrean, with no local terrestrial abode. It might almost be said that in the Iliad they are subject to the law of gravitation, from which in the Odyssey they have been emancipated.

But to come to special cases which are believed to show a progress in mythologic evolution. In the Iliad, Apollo is the sun; he is, moreover, a local deity, "the ruler of Chryse and Killa and Tenedos." In the Odyssey, Helios is the sun, while Apollo is exalted to the higher functions of one of the rulers of the universe. In the Odyssey Hermes, as in later times, is the messenger of Zeus; in the Iliad, that office is performed by Iris, who, according to Mr. Gladstone, cannot be dissociated from the rainbow of the ninth chapter of Genesis. In the Iliad the wife of Hephaestus is Charis; in the Odyssey it is Aphrodite, as in the later theogonies.

All these discrepancies—which seem to ordinary critics to be notes of a prolonged evolution of religious ideas, and indications of the later date of the Odyssey—are, in Mr. Gladstone's opinion, only proofs of the unity of the origin of the two poems, and of the conscious endeavour of Homer to unify the old mythologic elements and to create out of them a national Hellenic religion, while they testify to the supreme genius of the poet in adapting his mythology to the conceptions appropriate to the inner zone of civilisation and the outer zone of barbarism.

All the apparent differences in the two poems must be explained by the same convenient hypothesis. The Iliad is legendary history; the personages are human, real, and possible. The Odyssey is poetical romance; personages magical and impossible—Circe, Calypso, and the Sirens—are introduced, we have round-eyed Cyclopes, enchanters, magicians, ogres, giants, cannibals. The geography in one case is real; the other is in cloudland, all is vague and visionary; we have descents into Hades, and floating islands girt with impenetrable walls of brass. The geographical horizon of the Iliad is bounded by the Propontis; while the Argonautic legend, with which the author of the Odyssey was clearly acquainted, belongs to the period when the coasts of the Euxine had been explored by the adventurous mariners of Miletus.

But these discrepancies are just what Mr. Gladstone thinks we should expect. The inner zone of the Iliad, the land of history and legend, was personally known to Homer; while the outer zone of the Odyssey, a cloudland of mystery and wonder, was known to him by the accounts he obtained from Phœnician mariners, who, "dealing with one who was at their mercy, had the double temptation, on the one hand, of indulging in the marvellous, and on the other of so dressing their relations as not to invite possible competitors into the regions from whence they drew exclusive gains." So it appears, after all, that the giants and enchanters of the Odyssey were invented by Phœnician sailors, and not by the supreme creative genius of one of the two consummate poets whom the world has seen.

The convenient theory of the two zones must also explain the fact that the manners and institutions of the Odyssey belong to a more advanced stage of civilization than those of the Iliad. The outer barbaric zone was, it would seem, more civilised than the inner. Archaeology and linguistic palæontology have proved that the primitive Aryans had not domesticated the pig, that they did not eat fish, and were ignorant of the art of fishing—the names for fish and for implements for catching fish differing in the chief Aryan languages. The Iliad belongs to this early stage; the heroes do not eat fish; while in the Odyssey they not only eat fish, but possess fish-hooks, like the Greeks of the historic period. Cheese, which was unknown to the primitive Aryans, is also unknown in the Iliad, but is an article of diet in the Odyssey. The heroes of the Iliad consume oxen; while in the Odyssey they also eat sheep, goats, and swine.

Mr. Gladstone has not yet got rid of the exploded notion of the derivation of Greek culture and mythology from Egypt. He believes that at some remote period Greece was in subjection to Egypt, that there was a retaliatory invasion of Egypt by the Achæans soon after the Hebrew exodus, and that, in pursuance of the same policy, the voyage of the Argo was directed against certain Egyptian colonies on the Euxine. Hence it is no matter of surprise that, in order to establish the "Phœnicianism" of Boeotia, which needs no proof, he cites as Egyptian the name of the Boeotian Thebes. The name of the Boeotian Thebes is not Egyptian, and it can be otherwise explained; the name occurring elsewhere in Greek territory—in Thessaly, in Mysia, and near Miletus. Moreover, the real name of the Egyptian Thebes was not Thebes. It appears as Ape in the hieroglyphic inscriptions, the dental being merely the prefixed article; T-ape, "the capital," becoming Theba in the Memphis dialect; a form which was assimilated by the Greeks to that of their own city.

Mr. Gladstone's acquaintance with the Homeric text is minute and almost exhaustive, and his enthusiasm for his author boundless. It is a misfortune that with these qualifications for his task he has not assimilated the fundamental canons of historical criticism, and is unable to recognise the plainest signs of literary and religious evolution. Hence his Landmarks of Homeric Study are not landmarks of our present knowledge, but merely high-water marks of the school of criticism which was in vogue some fifty years ago.

ISAAC TAYLOR.

"ENGLISH LEADERS OF RELIGION."—Cardinal Newman. By R. H. Hutton. (Methuen.)

READERS of contemporary literature, whatever be their opinions or their tastes, hold in respect the name of Mr. Hutton; they know that in his writings they will find dignity, courtesy, simplicity. He writes at all times in a spirit of real learning and intellectual elevation; he never produces careless and hasty work, in the fashion of the day. And it is noticeable that the name of Newman never fails to call forth from him his best and finest gifts: gifts of sympathy, of reverence, of appreciation. It is not too much to say that this brief Life of Newman is as perfect as any man not a Catholic could write; it is full of knowledge, excellent in method, and intelligent in criticism. The death of Cardinal Newman has evoked a general and public sympathy, a unanimous and generous praise, such as no other man's death has done for many years; and this is no place, nor is this the time, to say anything especial upon the matter. Nor, indeed, can we criticise with any minuteness Mr. Hutton's work. Personally, we regard it as wholly admirable. It is not, doubtless, a complete study of Newman; it does not profess to give a thorough exposition of his significance as a thinker and theologian, a philosopher and man of letters. It is a contribution to the history of "religious life and thought in this and the last century," as exemplified in the "English leaders of religion" during that period. Considered so, this little book supplies all that we can demand; it tells the story of Newman's life, it dwells upon the prominent characteristics of Newman's mind, it indicates the chief tendencies of his work and thought.

Every life of Newman must, of necessity, be based upon the Apologia; and Mr. Hutton has almost achieved the impossible: he has almost succeeded in abridging that masterpiece. There is one biography in our language, and Boswell wrote it; the one autobiography Newman has written. From this wonderful and pathetic record Mr. Hutton has compiled a fair and judicious narrative: fair, because he suppresses nothing; judicious, because we can discern the truth, the prevailing motive, in different passages and circumstances.

But the most original and important part of this book is contained in two chapters; those upon Newman's Alleged Scepticism and upon the Theory of Development. It is here that Mr. Hutton does good service to history and to common sense. He makes it clear that Newman was not an infidel at heart, given over to superstition, voluntarily; and that Newman's conception of theology was not eclectic, personal, and forced, but scientific, historical, and authoritative. The charge of suppressed scepticism has been brought against Newman by writers and thinkers of very various minds: by Prof. Huxley, for example, and by Mr. Swinburne. The latter, as a philosophical logician, we may safely ignore; but the weighty assertions of Prof. Huxley require an answer, and Mr. Hutton has furnished it, to the satisfaction of all fair and open minds. To all such charges, inexplicable to those acquainted with Newman's work, it is enough reply to quote the Apologia:

"Many persons are very sensitive of the difficulties of Religion; I am as sensitive of them as any one; but I have never been able to see a connexion between apprehending those difficulties, however keenly, and multiplying them to any extent, and on the other hand doubting the doctrines to which they are attached. Ten thousand difficulties do not make one doubt, as I understand the subject; difficulty and doubt are incommensurate."

Or, again, in The Grammar of Assent, the most careful distinctions are drawn between true and false belief. For example:

"This practice of assenting simply on authority, with the pretence and without the reality of assent, is what is meant by formalism. To say 'I do not understand a proposition, but I accept it on authority,' is not formalism; it is not a direct assent to the proposition, still it is an assent to the authority which enunciates it."

Or, to take a decisive passage:

"Of the two, I would rather have to maintain that we ought to begin with believing everything that is offered to our acceptance, than that it is our duty to doubt of everything. This, indeed, seems the true way of learning. In that case, we soon discover and discard what is contradictory; and error having always some portion of truth in it, and the truth having a reality which error has not, we may expect that when there is an honest purpose and fair talents, we shall somehow make our way forward, the error falling off from the mind and the truth developing and occupying it."

The chapter upon the Theory of Development, while far from accepting Newman's argument in its entirety, yet seizes upon its magnificent characteristics, its historical breadth, its intuition into spiritual tendencies and logical issues. The book has met with many and able antagonists, such as Mozley, Hare, and the learned Archer Butler; but we feel, in reading them, that they are struggling against the stream, grasping at straws, trying to arrest the progress of history and of growth. Newman's "spontaneous perception of truth," to use his own words, led him infallibly right; not logic, in its formal sense, not reasoning and learning, of themselves, but a subtle, spiritual genius was his guide. It is curious, painful, and profitable to read, beside the Cardinal's Apologia, his brother's Phases of Faith. In that, too, we recognise the instinctive view, the swift following of thought after thought, the faithful obedience to changed convictions. In truth, there was no resting place for either, and there is none for any man of consistency between the extremes; and Newman displays, what Anglicans and Protestants do not, the thoroughness and the completeness of belief. That is to say, he refused to listen to the compromises which indolence or self-will suggest. If faith in God imply Christianity, if Christianity imply Catholicism, if Catholicism imply endless difficulties to the human mind, Newman would have the believer in God, in virtue of his faith and of its issues, accept the difficulties without hesitation, as parts of a necessary mystery. In Mr. Birrell's Obiter Dicta, those sayings by the way which we may afford to disregard, occurs this pathetic exclamation:

"Oh, Spirit of Truth, where wert thou, when the remorseless deep of superstition closed over the head of John Henry Newman, who surely deserved to be thy best-loved son?"

Had Newman ever wasted his time upon such writings, we can imagine what would have been his gentle contempt and pity for this foolish rhetoric. It was just such an attitude towards faith and towards Catholicism which Newman constantly deplored, exposed, dissected, and ridiculed:

"I really do think it is the world's judgment, that one principal part of a professor's work is the putting down such misgivings in his penitents. It fancies that the reason is ever rebelling, like the flesh; that doubt, like concupiscence, is elicited by every sight and sound, and that temptation insinuates itself in every page of letterpress, and through the very voice of a Protestant polemic. When it sees a Catholic priest, it looks hard at him, to make out how much there is of folly in his composition, and how much of hypocrisy. But, my dear brethren, if these are your thoughts, you are simply in error. Trust me, rather than the world, when I tell you that it is no difficult thing for a Catholic to believe; and that unless he grievously mismanages himself, the difficult thing is for him to doubt."

To criticise Mr. Hutton's book in detail would be to express little else than satisfaction with his work; the spirit of intellectual sympathy, of cordial reverence and affection, which animates it, is unfailing. But Mr. Hutton is, naturally, no servile admirer of Newman's thought and conclusions, however great be his admiration of Newman's character and life. And there is one point upon which he is constantly insisting: upon Newman's undue exaltation of, or care for, dogma. Such a passage as this is a good example of many similar passages:

"Dogma is essential in order to display and safeguard the revelation; but dogma is not itself the revelation. And it is conceivable that in drawing out and safeguarding the revelation, the Church may not unfrequently have laid even too much stress on right conceptions, and too little on right attitudes of will and emotion."

There is a difference between the quiet tone of Mr. Hutton and the excited fervour of Prof. Francis Newman; but we are reminded of the latter's outburst:

"Oh Dogma! Dogma! how dost thou trample under foot love, truth, conscience, justice! Was ever a Moloch worse than thou?"

Surely the answer to Mr. Hutton is that, though dogma be not revelation, yet revelation is dogma: "right attitudes of will and emotion" are essential, but "right" in relation to what? To those certainties, moral and spiritual, which exist alike in conscience and in revelation; but which conscience cannot formulate without revelation; while revelation is revelation of divine facts, which are ordered and systematised by the science of theology. Revelation without dogma is a blank; dogmas are the contents of revelation made clear, according to the wants of time and place, by an authority divinely commissioned. But of the whole subject there is no finer exposition than Newman's Idea of an University, and the lectures on theology contained there.

There are two points inevitably raised by any book or essay about Newman: his position and influence as an Anglican, and his value in literature. Upon the first point it is not necessary to say much: Securus judicat orbis terrarum. But there has grown up a tendency in certain quarters to renounce Newman as an exponent of Anglicanism: to assert that he was not the originator, in any sense, of the Oxford Movement. It was Keble, or Pusey, or Rose, or Alexander Knox, or Hurrell Froude; it was any one rather than Newman. Now, it is true that Wordsworth was not the first poet who "returned to Nature" after the days and the school of Pope; it is true that Scott was not the first to find inspiration in mediaeval romance; it is true that Coleridge was not the first to introduce German metaphysics. But it is pedantic to insist upon these absurd and trifling truths; and, just so, it is foolish to ascribe to any other man the place of teacher and inspirer held by Newman. Burgon has striven to do this; but the general voice of tradition is too strong for him. Pattison, Mr. Mozley, Mr. Wilfrid Ward, Shairp, Clough, Arnold and a thousand more, testify to the reality of Newman's supremacy. He alone was the genius of Oxford for the first half of this century. Contrast with him, to name only the dead, Faber and Ward, among Catholics; Keble and Pusey, among Anglicans. Wordsworth recognised in Faber the gifts of a great poet. Mill praised in Ward a subtle and powerful logic. The great merits of Keble and Pusey are beyond dispute. But all four are absolutely insignificant beside Newman; beside the man whose mind was "a miracle of intellectual delicacy," and his presence that of "a spiritual apparition." For Newman, all his life through, obeyed the command of Sir Thomas Browne:

"Let intellectual tubes give thee a glance of things which visive organs reach not. Have a glimpse of incomprehensibles, and thoughts of things which thoughts but tenderly touch. Lodge immaterials in thy head; ascend unto invisibles; fill thy spirit with spirituals, with the mysteries of faith, the magnalities of religion, and thy life with the honour of God."

To be "a man of one book" is a proverb. Certainly, to the present writer, the thirty-six volumes of Newman, from the most splendid and familiar passages down to their slightest and most occasional note, are better known than anything else in any literature and language. And so it is difficult to criticise those who do not acknowledge in Newman a master in literature; there is no writer whose mastery seems more clear and indisputable. Mr. Austin has lately said of him:

"A style which is superb in its vigour, ease, and suppleness, practically ceases to be a force in literature, and is to be found chiefly in theological remains, than which nothing is more forbidding. It makes me weep."

To the last words we can but say tu quoque. But, apart from the bigotry or the tastelessness of the passage, it is not even true that Newman's work is chiefly theological; that is, in the true sense of theology. There are twelve volumes of perfect oratory, not in the main theological, but ethical and psychological; there are, at most, but seven volumes of professed technical theology. The rest contain "infinite riches"—satire, humour, romance, criticism, poetry, history; he has composed Ciceronian dialogues; he has parodied prize poems; he has written African witch chants; he has satirised newspaper articles and public speeches; he has imitated the Greek tragic chorus; he has enriched criticism with faultless judgments. To him I turn for the truest estimates of Byron or of Cicero; for the best theory of portrait-painting; for the subtlest description of musical emotion. Newman was, emphatically, a man of social habit, and his books are more full than Thackeray's of worldly knowledge. And all this wealth of matter and thought is conveyed in a style of singular charm, of most strange and haunting beauty. Mr. Hutton has done justice to this side of Newman: to the magic of his words, half theirs by Newman's natural grace, and half by his simple sense of beauty. No man ever combined so much beauty of character with so much beauty of expression. In this harmony of qualities he, like his patron Saint Philip Neri, was an Athenian, but touched with a deeper sentiment: at once with more patience, and more passion.

LIONEL JOHNSON.

The Life of Henrik Ibsen. By Henrik Jaeger. Translated by Clara Bell. (Heinemann.)

IN these days, when we are promised the publication of a new play of Ibsen's simultaneously in London and Copenhagen, the existence of an elaborate biography of the poet, still scarcely beyond his sixtieth year, ceases to be an anomaly; and the appearance of an English translation of it affects us also like the fulfilment of a natural law. We welcome it heartily; and in order to discharge our single grudge against the publisher, let us say at once that our welcome would be still warmer if it contained the excellent portraits and other illustrations which enrich the original. No word is said of their omission, and such a word was, we think, due. With this reserve, the translation may be regarded as an unqualified boon to the many English students of Ibsen. Like Mr. Archer's third volume, it will, we trust, dissipate many illusions which have hitherto held their ground without difficulty in circles which regard it as a mark of provincialism to write in a tongue which they do not understand; and also in those other circles, partially coincident with the first, which tolerate the most insidious handling of forbidden subjects "for art's sake," but cannot repress their disgust when these are treated, with the most austere dignity and reserve, by the satirist or the reformer.

Herr Jaeger's book is not, indeed, in any sense specially addressed to Ibsen's hostile critics; it is no Apologia for his life or for his work. It is even, for a contemporary biography of one still living and labouring, remarkably free from the highly charged colouring of the partisan. One would rather complain that the colour is too meagre and too monotonous, and that the poet's vigorous personality tends to be lost sight of in the minute analysis of its achievements. Herr Jaeger is, we should say, by instinct and by habit a student of literature, and by accident a student of Ibsen; in other words, his treatment suggests that he regards his subject rather as a mass of fascinating material for analysis than as of absorbing interest as a man. At any rate, his biography will strike the unsophisticated English reader as being, in spite of much literary brilliance here and there, rather aggressively scientific in method; as dealing, for instance, like Prof. Brandl's Coleridge, with sources and antecedents in a thorough-going fashion, which is necessarily a little shocking to the amateur. It is, in short, a detailed and analytic exposition of Ibsen's career, composed by a learned and cautious critic whose admiration is capable of genuine eloquence, but has not the least tendency to dithyramb.

In two features the translation possesses a certain claim even upon those already acquainted with the original. On the one hand it continues the story of Ibsen's career so as to include his last play, published since the appearance of the original—a notice of "Fruen fra Havet," by Mr. Gosse, being inserted near the close. And, on the other hand, Mr. Gosse has also contributed a number of verse-renderings of the passages quoted by Herr Jaeger. These renderings are often of great merit, and, as a whole, give the English reader a more vivid idea of the brilliance of Ibsen's verse than he can at present, so far as we know, otherwise obtain. They represent fragments of the lyrics, and of the three great verse dramas—"Love's Comedy," "Brand," and "Peer Gynt." Nearly all the most characteristic notes of Ibsen's verse are here in some sort reproduced—from the dazzling and concentrated wit of "Love's Comedy" to the rollicking rhymes of "Peer," and the prophetic fervour of "Brand." As a specimen of the first we may refer to Falk's satiric account of the destiny of married lovers, on p. 116. We do not think Mr. Gosse quite so successful in conveying the fiery denunciations of "Brand." Perhaps his poetic past is less in accord with this sterner and more tragic note. One thinks, in spite of oneself, of Milton's sonnets rendered into velvet verse by Herrick or Carew; of André Chenier's Iambes, re-written by Musset or Lamartine. Here is part of the famous attack on Norway (Gå blot omkring i dette land):—

"Just wander through this land to-day,
And listen to what people say,
And thou wilt find to each man cling
A little piece of everything.
He's slightly loyal on the whole,
A little serious for his soul,
A little given to table pleasure,
But so his fathers were, in measure."

* * * * *
A little prodigal of pledges,
A little smart to blunt their edges,
A little quick to start, but clever
In dawdling on and on for ever.
The words "a little" gauge his spirit,
He goes not far in fault or merit;
In good or ill alike, a fraction
Restlessly passive, faint in action,
Made up of fractions, each sufficient
To spoil the other's co-efficient."

Here a good deal of the trenchant energy of the original is dissipated. The construction of lines 3-4 is rather artificial, and the expression indirect; l. 5 loses by departing from the iteration of "a little," and by the gratuitous "on the whole"; l. 8 by the equally gratuitous "in measure"; ll. 9-12 are neat but decidedly free, substituting two images for one; l. 13 is tame; l. 16 is free for "a fraction in great things and in small"; finally, the last couplet violently extracts and exposes a mathematical witicism which, though certainly implied in the original, is there decently veiled and not permitted to obtrude, incongruous as it would be with the situation. However, faultlessly to render a poet so individual and so full of quality as Ibsen, is one of the most difficult tasks in literature; and the slightness of the flaws noticed above may serve to indicate how close and trustworthy Mr. Gosse's versions as a whole are. And having spoken disparagingly of some of the renderings from "Brand," we will close by referring to the spirited and finished description of the Foged (p. 146). These translations should add to the success of a book itself admirably translated. We may add that an article on "Brand," with abundant specimens excellently translated, has just been contributed by Prof. Arthur Palmer to the New Englander (October, 1890):

C. H. HERFORD.

PUBLIC EDUCATION IN EGYPT.

L'Instruction Publique en Egypte. By Yacoub Artin Pasha. (Paris: Leroux.)

THE English parent who has to be coaxed, cajoled, summoned, and threatened into sending his children to school—who is, we are given to understand, insensible to all blandishments less seductive than a primary education entirely free as well as compulsory—may well take heart of grace from the history of Egypt. Thirty or forty years ago all the schools—primary, secondary, special, or "higher"—in that country were filled by "coercion," which, though of course an outrage on the dignity of human nature, is not even yet quite discredited as a means of dealing with the truancy of ordinary experience, and some other forms of fractious naughtiness. And in Egypt, at least, there are many who have reason to be thankful for the beneficent use of the rod that spared not. Men high in office are not ashamed to recall the days when they were marched in chains to school with a hundred others, their parents following the unwilling regiments with weeping and wailing, as genuine as the sorrow that displayed itself over the more serious, and perhaps less salutary, military conscription. Some of the ablest and wisest of the present Khedive's ministers rose from these ranks; and difficult as it must be to keep the educational ship weather-tight when intrigues do so much to stint the necessary modicum of tar, we may hope to see great things achieved in Egypt under its present enlightened prince.

The book which is the subject of this notice contains the record of the vicissitudes of schemes of public education in Egypt; and although there is some unnecessary discursiveness and a little "tall talk" before we come to the matter in hand, Artin Pasha is undoubtedly to be congratulated on a contribution to the history of educational effort which is at once most interesting and encouraging. And it is but right to add that, although there must have been frequent danger of giving some such political colour to the subject-matter as might have jarred on English readers, he has acquitted himself of a delicate task with much discretion. For, to begin with things as they are, let it be frankly stated that the question of ascendancy in Egypt is being fought by England and France not less keenly on the education question than on others; and if one country suspects the other of dealing which is something less than fair, it is permissible for an Englishman or a Frenchman or an official Egyptian to take what side he will. We therefore expect Frenchmen to execrate the inveterate perfidy of England, even in educational matters; and here and there an Englishman will, after his kind, consider his claim to independence of judgment concerned in singing bass to the foreigner's tenor; for συνέχθαι ἐφ' αὐτῷ. This, however, is the right place to point out in common fairness that the attachment of France for Egypt, which we are too ready to decry as "sentimental," has been based on at least some solid grounds of benefits conferred. It is not necessary to canonise Frenchmen as regenerators of Egypt; yet in the matter of educational organisation, if in nothing else, Egypt owes an immense debt to France, the French Government having freely given help whenever asked. Even in our own day French lycées, being, of course, governmental, offer special facilities to Egyptian youths to enable them to absorb French sentiment and take a French-polish. But of this hereafter.

Let us turn to the account of educational progress given us by Artin Pasha, who has special knowledge of his subject, and whose family have been closely and most honourably connected with the earliest systematised movements for the introduction of European methods in Egypt. The first effort to this end is not the least of the obligations which his country owed to Mehemet Ali. So far as can be clearly made out, it was in 1816 that the Pasha formed a military school on the European model and under the direction of European teachers. For special studies he sent young Mamelukes to Italy and afterwards to England. There followed a preparatory school at Kasr-el-'Aini about nine years later. But it should be remembered that these things were not for Arabs. In the first primary school established by the Egyptian Government, there were Circassian and Georgian Mamelukes, there were Turks, Kurds, Arnauts, Armenians, and Greeks; but no children of origin purely Egyptian. And while, of course, the teaching was given in Turkish, the only European language taught was Italian, the language spoken by the greater part of the teachers in the military school. After this, progress was comparatively rapid. The establishment of a school of medicine at home was followed by a "school mission" to France; so that in 1834 there were a hundred or more young Egyptians resident and studying in France at the Pasha's expense. Mehemet Ali's pet plan was undoubtedly to make these students teachers of special arts and sciences on their return, and our author's explanation of the plan is interesting enough to give in his own words:—

"... Lorsque les quarante élèves envoyés en Europe en 1826 rentrèrent en Egypte vers 1834, le Vice-Roi en personne remit à chacun d'eux, à l'audience qu'il leur accorda, un livre en français traitant de la science qu'il avait étudiée, et leur donna, à tous, l'ordre de traduire cet ouvrage en turc. Au sortir de l'audience, ces étudiants furent enfermés pendant trois mois à la citadelle, occupés à traduire ces ouvrages, et ils ne recouvrèrent leur liberté que lorsque leur tâche fut achevée. Ces traductions, après avoir été imprimées à l'imprimerie que le Pacha avait fondée à Boulaq, furent distribuées aux maîtres et aux élèves des écoles à l'usage spécial desquelles les ouvrages originaux avaient été choisis et traduits."

In the year 1836 was formed the first Council of Public Instruction. The Minister President, Moukhtar Bey, as well as most of his colleagues, had been trained in France—among them it is interesting to note the father and uncle of the author of this book—and, naturally, they were French methods that were introduced. But already there had arisen in Egypt a strong feeling that Egypt was for the Egyptians, and the new council adopted and fostered it with more discretion than all councils have always shown in dealing with a sentiment. A great change in educational matters followed inevitably. Eight classes of primary and secondary schools were constituted on the model of the French lycées, and to these schools flocked Arab children. Arabic was therefore adopted as the channel of instruction. But, unfortunately for the immediate success of the scheme, the only source of supply of teachers was El Azhar, and this "university" had been for centuries the cradle and centre of Arab "science." Those who do not know what this means will find in Artin Pasha's book more than enough to explain its barrenness; and yet the influence of its methods is to this day a barrier to real progress in Egypt, and Artin Pasha is bold enough to say it. Before 1840 there were, as the direct outcome of the work of Moukhtar Bey's council, sixteen "special" schools and fifty-four primary schools, providing for between eight and nine thousand scholars, all of whom were lodged, fed, clothed, and taught at the public expense. Up to 1836 foreigners alone had been admissible to the schools, but now—

"... On prit le parti d'introduire, dans toutes les écoles primaires et spéciales, de jeunes enfants égyptiens de race, concurremment avec les mamelouks caucasiens et les étrangers. On les admit, naturellement, aux mêmes conditions d'entretien. On ne pourrait, en effet, procéder autrement, car l'antipathie que le paysan égyptien éprouvait contre la conscription militaire s'étendit à la conscription scolaire, si je puis m'exprimer ainsi, et, malgré tous les avantages qu'on offrait aux parents, dont l'Etat se chargeait d'entretenir, d'élever, et d'instruire les enfants, ils se montraient unanimement rebelles à profiter de ces avantages. On eut alors recours à la coercition, à une véritable conscription ou presse scolaire, et on remplit presque toutes les écoles primaires, secondaires, spéciales, ou supérieures, d'enfants enlevés de force à leurs parents et que l'on distribuait dans ces écoles d'après leur âge, leur constitution, leur taille, quitta, après à les renvoyer, à les changer d'école ou à les y conserver, selon leurs aptitudes intellectuelles spéciales."

But, beside the lack of home-grown teachers, there was another difficulty unsurmounted, which necessitated recourse anew to Europe. Arabic itself was found inadequate to express the new ideas that were to come with the European teaching of arts and sciences, which to Arabs were all but new. An Egyptian school was founded in Paris, the direction in general being confided to an Egyptian officer, and the organisation of studies to French officers nominated by the French Minister of War. But this scheme was found not only expensive but ineffectual in its main object, for the school was a little Egypt in itself, hardly influenced at all by the air of Paris circumambient. On the suggestion, accordingly, of Nubar Pasha, the young Egyptians were sent to different schools; isolated thus from one another, they were to get as much of France into their constitutions as was good for them. This plan has really been carried out and enlarged with much success. Considerable numbers of the future citizens of Egypt are at this moment in French schools and colleges, and a few are scattered about in England and elsewhere. It is no secret that efforts have been made to increase largely the number of Egyptian boys being educated in this country, and it cannot be doubted that, to prevent at least the one-sidedness that results from an almost exclusively French educational influence, these efforts deserve to be seconded heartily by all Englishmen who have a real interest in education as distinguished from politics, and who would have their country represented in Egypt by the best it has to give. Egyptian parents are, however, most industriously warned by the wiseacres of such prints as the Bosphore Egyptien and some native journals that to send their sons
